Colonel FLEMING. The main difference between the two laws is that the French law did not provide much flexibility. When the Blum Popular Front Government came into power in France in 1936, it reduced the workweek from around 48 hours to 40. This was a hard and fast limitation for most industry. Overtime could be worked only under exceptional circumstances. As I have pointed out, the wage and hour law contains no such strict limitations.

Mr. NICHOLS. What about the wage provisions of the French law?

Colonel FLEMING. This is where most of the trouble arose. The law required that the same wages be paid for 40 hours as had previously been paid for 48. This was a real shock to French industry. It meant an increase of 20 percent all at once in their wage rates.

Mr. NICHOLS. I can see how such a law would tend to curtail production. Was that law in effect when war was declared?

Colonel FLEMING. No. There again, the armchair generals have ignored the actual situation. When Germany marched into Austria in the Spring of 1938, the Popular Front Government was no longer in power in France. Under the increasing pressure of the international situation, the 40-hour week was gradually abandoned. Not long after the agreement was signed at Munich, the workweek in those industries working directly or indirectly in the interest of national defense had been lengthened to 60 hours.

Mr. NICHOLS. I have read that all the time France was operating under the 40-hour law, or various modifications of it, German workers were toiling 84 hours a week without overtime pay, and had been for 5 years before the war broke out. That certainly must have had a good deal to do with the Germans' amazing "blitzkrieg" successes.

Colonel FLEMING. Eighty-four hours a week! How in the world did you find that out?

Mr. NICHOLS. I read it in a newspaper article by one of the Washington columnists.

Colonel FLEMING. I am afraid the credulity of the writer had been gravely imposed upon. I suppose it is natural, because of their amazing successes, to attribute to the Dictator and his Nazis feats of superhuman strength and cunning. But I suspect that Nazis are made of flesh and blood, like the rest of us, and suffer from the same limitations upon human endurance. At any rate, it simply isn't true to say that German workers have been toiling 84 hours a week. From July 26, 1934, to January 1, 1939, German industry was on an 8-hour day, 48-hour week.

Mr. NICHOLS. Then you mean that 9 months before the war broke out the French law allowed industry to work longer hours than the German?

Colonel FLEMING. Precisely. The Nazis did not introduce the 10-hour day, 60-hour week until January 1939. After this time in more vital munitions industries hours up to 16 a day could be permitted by the labor inspector.

Mr. NICHOLS. How did such long hours work out?

Colonel FLEMING. They didn't work out. Let me quote from the Monthly Labor Review: "Production began to fall off rapidly, accompanied by such an alarming increase of industrial accidents and stoppages as to attract the serious attention of the governmental authorities. * * * The Government applied the sternest measures against the suspected saboteurs, but also began to lighten somewhat the hard labor conditions."

Mr. NICHOLS. You mean even Nazis have a limit?

Colonel FLEMING. Yes. The Nazis could shoot the lagging worker but they couldn't stand outraged Mother Nature up against the wall. Fatigue is still fatigue in any language. This accords with common sense and the experience of every other industrial nation. The fact is that no important nation in the world today, whether Democratic, Fascist, or Communist, believes that it is possible for a modern industrial system to operate in peace or war without social and labor regulation. Take our own country, for instance. During the last war the United States Army was in the forefront in demanding that we safeguard our American labor standards.

Mr. NICHOLS. The United States Army? Why?

Colonel FLEMING. Let me tell you in the Army's own words. This is what the Chief of Ordnance and the Quartermaster General said in a general order issued 7 months after we had entered the war:

"Industrial history," they said, "proves that reasonable hours, fair working conditions, and a proper wage scale are essential to high production. The pressing argument for maintaining industrial safeguards in the present emergency is that they actually contribute to efficiency. To waive them would be a short-sighted policy, leading gradually but inevitably toward lowered production. It might be expected that an individual working 10 hours a day, instead of 8, would turn out more goods. He can, for the first few days. But experience shows us that in a few weeks, or a few months, the output will be the same, or even less, than it was during the shorter day."

Mr. NICHOLS. The Army's point, then, was that shorter hours bring higher production.

Colonel FLEMING. Exactly. The Army, which was as desperately in need of supplies then as it is today, realized that American labor standards were not standards of peace and leisure. They were the standards of efficiency. This was borne out in the last war, not only in this country but also in Great Britain. Exhaustive studies were made by the British after the war concerning the relative efficiency of long and short workweeks.

Mr. NICHOLS. What did these studies show, Colonel?

Colonel FLEMING. During the World War, in an effort to increase output, hours of work in the British munitions plants were greatly increased. An investigation by an official commission showed that the long hours imposed too severe a strain on the workers; that the rate of production decreased; that the extra hours produced proportionately little or no additional output; and that the quality of the output suffered.

Mr. NICHOLS. Did British employers try experiments with workweeks of different lengths to see whether they really could produce more goods in a shorter workweek?

Colonel FLEMING. Yes. In one ordnance factory they tried first a 66-hour week, then a 55-hour week, and finally a 45½-hour week. The workers produced 10 percent more in 55 hours than in 66, and only 1 percent less in 45½ hours than they had in 55 hours.

Mr. NICHOLS. That should dispel the popular notion that production can be increased by the unlimited lengthening of hours. These facts show that just the opposite seems to happen—at least beyond a certain point.

Colonel FLEMING. That has been the experience of American industry. That is what our industrialists have found after reducing their hours of work from 12 hours a day to as low, in some cases, as 6.

Mr. NICHOLS. While it is true, as you say, that there are many millions of unemployed workers in the United States, it is my understanding that there still is a shortage of skilled workers.

Colonel FLEMING. But is there a shortage of skilled labor; and if so, does it warrant discarding all regulation of wages and hours? I have seen a preliminary summary on this subject made by the Social Security Board.

Mr. NICHOLS. What does this survey show?

Colonel FLEMING. A tabulation of some 5,100,000 registered jobseekers made at the beginning of April shows that in 33 States there were 23,000 technicians, 657,000 skilled craftsmen and 858,000 semiskilled production workers unemployed and looking for jobs. And these figures do not include New York and some other important industrial States. Of these, approximately 1,500 aircraft workers in the 20 most important occupations were found to be unemployed.

Mr. NICHOLS. But if we are going to expand aircraft production fourfold, we shall need many more than 1,500 additional workers.

Colonel FLEMING. Yes; and it is also true that some of the skilled men now idle are skilled in building construction or other occupations not directly related to defense production. Nevertheless, at the beginning of the national-defense program, it is important to place the emphasis upon the training of new workers rather than the extension of hours for present workers. Let us not burn our candle at both ends. If for no other reason, time and a half for overtime is a worth-while prod to induce employers to expand their personnel now. The wage and hour law makes ample provision for the training of skilled workers by permitting their employment, under proper safeguards, at less than the minimum wage rate.

Mr. NICHOLS. Don't most of the skilled workers depend upon collective-bargaining contracts for overtime pay rather than on the wage and hour law?

Colonel FLEMING. Yes. The result of relaxing the wage and hour law would simply be to permit the working of unorganized, unskilled workers—of which there is an abundant oversupply—long hours without paying for the overtime, while the skilled workers would continue to collect for overtime as before.

Mr. NICHOLS. Do you know whether industry has been training skilled workers on a large scale before now?

Colonel FLEMING. Far-sighted employers have been making provision for the training of skilled workers for sometime. The crucial machine-tool industry, according to the president of its trade association, is well prepared for the national-defense program, because for many months it has been training new workers and installing new machinery.

Mr. NICHOLS. That is very encouraging. It would seem that some of the stories being printed today are based more on fear than on fact.

Colonel FLEMING. In conclusion let me say again that, in my opinion, no relaxation of the wage and hour law is necessary at this time, nor is it desirable. Only today the President affirmed his support of this view. Legitimate businessmen themselves are not asking for it, because they know perfectly well that it does not handicap them. The law is fair, because if upon labor is laid the burden of long hours, a corresponding burden is laid upon the employer who must pay for that overtime. The wage and hour law represents a part of that fair, equitable, democratic order of which we are so proud and which we are resolved to defend at any cost. Certainly no sane man defends his most priceless possessions by throwing them away as he gets ready to fight for them.

Tribute to the Late Senator Logan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

ADDRESS BY GEORGE McCOMBS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an eloquent tribute to the late Senator M. M. Logan by George McCombs, delivered on Memorial Day, May 30, at the Brownsville Lodge, No. 164, Independent Order of Odd Fellows. These words will bring back to the Members of the Senate, and all who read them, the splendid abilities and deep-hearted spirit of Senator Logan.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For many years past this day of each year has been designated, set aside, and observed as the day to pay tribute to our dead. It has been a day of sad memories and of tears. At this time the hearts of our people are unusually burdened and saddened on account of the wretched and terrible conditions prevailing in a large portion of the world—greed, avarice, heartless cruelty. War and destruction are loosened and running rampant.

These vicious and destructive forces have gathered great momentum and are sweeping away the most cherished hopes and virtues of mankind, namely, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, leaving in its wake death, suffering, misery, and despair. These things dearest to the hearts of our people are being crushed and destroyed in other parts of the world. And while we rejoice that these destructive forces of war, misery, and despair have not invaded our country nor directly visited its wrath upon us, and while we hope and pray that it may not, yet we realize that these terrible war clouds of the east which have produced this disastrous conflagration have cast shadows across the pathways of our people and shut out the sunshine of life. The thunderous roar of its devices and instruments of cruel destruction strikes terror to the hearts of the people, and today American people stand with bowed heads at the graves of its dead.

Our beloved deceased brother to whose memory we now pay tribute was at the time of his death known to the country at large as the Honorable M. M. Logan, United States Senator from Kentucky. To us he was, he is, and always will be simply "Mills" Logan, our friend and brother of Edmonson County. He was a product of Edmonson County pure and simple. He was the product of the forces of Nature working together in unison and harmony with the hills, the streams, and the people of Edmonson County over a period of 150 years. That made him what he was. Before leaving Edmonson County he possessed and had demonstrated every qualification and attribute of mind and of heart that later characterized his distinguished and honored life of public service to the people. His life was a pride, a blessing, and an honor to the county that gave him birth, and provided and instilled within him those characteristic virtues that made him useful and great. In return he did more than any other person, living or dead, to bring respect to Edmonson County.

Despite the weakness and poverty of Edmonson County compared with others as to territory, population, and wealth, it was never his embarrassment or apology but his pride and inspiration in meeting and discharging public duty and trust in the higher positions of public service. He was not from Edmonson County but was and is and always will be of Edmonson County. Hence, it is entirely fitting and proper and in keeping with his expressed wishes that his last resting place be at the scenes of his childhood and that his remains be returned to the spot that gave him birth.

Thirty-six years ago he was a leader in a movement to establish the Odd Fellows lodge that we represent today. He was one of the 13 charter members of this organization created for the purpose of the diffusion of the principles of benevolence and charity and the teachings of friendship, love, and truth. Before entering this fraternal order he possessed in an unusual degree every characteristic and virtue required to make a good and useful member. He rapidly rose to distinction and leadership in his home lodge and brought State-wide, Nation-wide, and world-wide distinction and honor to himself and our Odd Fellows lodge. He occupied and graced every position of trust and honor in this great order and, becoming sovereign grand master of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the World, he carried the message of the achievements of Brownsville Lodge No. 164 across the seas.

It required on Mills Logan's part no effort or sacrifice to live Odd Fellowship. His every heart throb beat in unison and sympathy with the teachings of the order. Living, spreading, and teaching the principles of benevolence and charity were the natural and spontaneous outflow of his great soul. He was the good samaritan to the wounded, the neglected, and the distressed. He found great pleasure in relieving misery, in caring for the sick in mind or body, and to assist in educating the orphan was part of his religion. Of all his great virtues, charity was his outstanding characteristic. His love for and desire to help his fellowman knew no bounds. His sympathies were always with the poor, the weak, the wronged, and the underprivileged. He was as meek as the lowly Nazarene, and the humblest and least deserving could always approach him with assurance of a kindly, sympathetic hearing, and were never repulsed or turned away empty handed. To those who may have reviled or despitefully used him, he held no malice or animus. His life was a life of unremitting toil and sacrifice to and for people, and were everyone to whom he did a favor or loving sacrifice to bring today a flower to lay upon his grave he would sleep tonight under a heavy blanket of blossoms that would bank high up this beautiful and enduring granite monument that marks his last resting place.

He was loyal, faithful, and true to his people, to his lodge, to his church and to his Creator. He never forsook or neglected a friend. He never betrayed or abused any trust confided to him by the people.

The life and achievements of Senator LOGAN is a challenge and an inspiration to the youth of the land and especially to the youth of Edmonson. He has blazed the way from the old log cabin that stands in sight of this monument, to the United States Senate. He has shown that it can be done despite poverty and obscurity or lack of educational advantages.

He has proven that:

"Honor and fame from no condition rise" and has taught the valuable lesson to "act well your part; there all the honor lies."

As he consistently climbed to higher positions of useful services and honor his burdens became heavier and finally his burdens became so great that his physical being was so tired and exhausted that he has lain down by the wayside to rest, using his burdens for a pillow, and has fallen into that dreamless sleep.

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, sayeth the Spirit, that they may rest from their labor; and their works do follow them."

Universal Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. CLAUDE PEPPER, OF FLORIDA

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by me on the subject Should the United States Require Universal Conscription? which was published in the Sunday Times-Union, of Jacksonville, Fla., on Sunday, July 28, 1940.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sunday Times-Union, Jacksonville, Fla., of July 28, 1940]

SHOULD THE UNITED STATES REQUIRE UNIVERSAL CONSCRIPTION?

(By Senator CLAUDE PEPPER)

In this crucial period, the whole of this great Nation is concerned about the safety of our country and the preservation of our institutions. We have been thrown, by conditions over which we have no control, into a maelstrom of war and all of its consequential chaos the world over. International law, the restraints of morality and religion have been repudiated and disdained. Force alone has come to be the arbitrator of the destiny of nations, of liberty, and of Christianity.

The mightiest conflict which ever raged is sweeping across the earth. Mussolini restated it when he entered the war: "This revolution * * * asserts itself against those who control the riches of the earth. * * * It is a struggle of one century against another. * * * This asserts itself against the strangers, the richer nations. It is a struggle between young and progressive people as against decadent people."

The dictatorships have gone into a war for loot, for territory, for gold, for trade, for power. They have mobilized every unit of their people and resources to wage war for gain and for conquest.

Those who stand in their way are the democracies of the world. The democratic nations have the territory, the resources, the gold, the power to produce in factories and on farms the good things of the world which the dictators want. Furthermore, the totalitarian states have evolved a system of government, a way of life which is the antithesis of the democratic way, and they have a fanatic's zeal to bring the world under the sway of that system by whatever means necessary.

Unless the dictators repudiate their designs and alter their philosophies, or the democracies relinquish what they have and change their faith, there can be no end to this conflict short of defeat for one side.

This condition of the world leaves the United States with no alternative but to prepare itself to the utmost, to marshal its whole strength for a clash which is not in the future but already in deadly progress—the shadow of which falls more heavily across our continent and our country with the passing of each sad day.

Our efforts therefore must be nothing less than total efforts.

Every able-bodied man who is needed to bear arms must be trained for armed service until 1,000,000, 2,000,000, 3,000,000—all we can ever need—are prepared for service if our country's defense demands that they be called into active duty. The number who are thus trained among the citizens will diminish the number required in a standing professional army—an army of paid soldiers.

Thus I favor universal service for our defense. It is the democratic way for filling the ranks of a democratic army, and it is necessary to assure the integrity of our land and of what we love.

But it is not enough that those called under universal service be soldiers only. We must have mechanics and technicians of every class. Democratic universal service requires that all who are needed in a great defense effort be called to their country's service and perform such duties as they are best fitted to perform. We will never again see the day when our Nation, fighting for its life, will have the spectacle of men in the Army at $30 a month, men in the shipyards at $18 a day, and men in management enjoying salaries of $50,000 a year.

The training our young men will get in military service will be of inestimable value to them in the discipline they learn, in the physical strength they will develop, in the skills they acquire. Many of those called will learn trades and arts, gain experience, acquire skill which will serve them in civil pursuits as well as in their country's defense.

The whole Nation, under a well-proportioned program of this character, will gain a new solidarity, feel a fresh unity, sense a degree of patriotism which will make our democracy, not a decadent and antiquated system but a vital and living force, capable of its defense, proud of its own righteous power, determined to preserve for itself and for the world its own honorable way of life. Hence, by mobilizing all our great strength we will not only save America but we will build America into yet a greater nation than she has ever been before in all her long history.

Bryan Memorial Breakfast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

ADDRESS BY WILLIAM RITCHIE, OF OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. William Ritchie, of Omaha, Nebr., at the William Jennings Bryan memorial breakfast held in connection with the 1940 Democratic National Convention, in the Hotel Sherman, Chicago, Ill., on June 17, 1940. I may state that Mr. Ritchie was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention from Nebraska and voted consistently against a third Presidential term.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, fellow Democrats, Nebraska glories in the fact that from her broad plains and fertile fields, from the travail and hardships of her pioneers, the gay spirit of a young man, just come from Illinois, soared to the heavens with the song of a lark. Nebraska is proud of the fact that she gave William Jennings Bryan to the Nation, to humanity, to the ages.

In the hindsight of a half century of history, it is now clear as crystal that William Jennings Bryan was the John the Baptist of the outstanding political and social advances made in America by the present generation. Followers of few world statesmen can boast so proud a record.

My poor endowments will not enable me to picture to you Bryan's glorious qualities and career; your thoughts and memories will bring these to you better than I can, so I shall content myself with telling you a personal experience which may not be generally known, and which I hope will help to bring the Great Commoner back to us for a few moments this morning.

Many of us here today remember the Thomas Fortune Ryan resolution which Mr. Bryan introduced at the Democratic National Convention in Baltimore in 1912, and which resulted in the nomination of Woodrow Wilson for the Presidency. Many of you will also remember that at that time it was charged that Mr. Bryan was thus seeking to nominate himself. I know that this was not so. I was an alternate delegate to that convention from Mr. Bryan's congressional district. After the nomination, returning to the Belvidere Hotel, I found myself in an elevator alone with Mr. and Mrs. Bryan. I said to Mr. Bryan: "Well, sir, how do you feel now?" Mrs. Bryan, beaming, spontaneously replied, "This is the happiest moment in our lives." Mr. Bryan joyously acquiesced. No one who saw and heard Mr. and Mrs. Bryan then could doubt that they spoke from the bottom of their hearts.

Looking back on that convention, I remember the bushel baskets full of telegrams that poured in upon the delegates after the Thomas Fortune Ryan speech was made. And I marvel now when I realize that Bryan's great voice and magnetic personality were confined to the walls of that auditorium; yet his spiritual appeal was so great, cold print could arouse the country to a magnificent response.

How history would now be changed if radio had been discovered and developed in his day.

Fellow Democrats, I love to think of Bryan's great spirit, wiser now that it is freed from the burdens of the flesh, hovering over us today. I gain inspiration from his memory to take heart and courage to do my duty here as it hath vouchsafed God to show me the way and the light; so that I may here in this grave hour of our country's history stand firm for liberty, justice, and democracy, and for the safety, security, and perpetuation of our great republic.

Agreement at Habana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial from the Washington Post of Wednesday, July 31, 1940, entitled "Agreement at Habana."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of July 31, 1940]

AGREEMENT AT HABANA

Of the three agreements concluded at the Habana conference, by far the most important is that which provides for a collective American trusteeship over European possessions in this hemisphere in the event that their status as dependencies of democratic nations is affected by the outcome of the present war.

This agreement is important—and far-reaching in its implications—for three separate reasons. The first of these is the manner in which it enlarges and modifies the scope of the Monroe Doctrine.

That cornerstone of American foreign policy has heretofore been essentially unilateral. That is to say, it was promulgated and has been made effective by the United States alone, without regard to the policies of the various Latin American republics.

Broadly speaking, we have heretofore maintained that we would regard any further attempt by European powers "to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." We have always hoped that other American republics would take the same attitude. But whether they approved or not in no way affected the position of the United States. The Monroe Doctrine was a policy of self-defense, its operation not contingent upon the cooperation of our neighbors.

The development of pan-American unity has for some years tended to broaden this original conception of the Monroe Doctrine, and to make it a joint rather than an individual undertaking. But until the present Habana conference it could not be said that the unilateral doctrine had become multilateral. It does so with the signing of the convention which develops into a matter of continental concern those contingencies which President Monroe had defined as dangerous to our peace and safety.

This aspect of the major convention approved at Habana would of itself make this draft treaty a matter of great historic importance. But beyond that the new convention provides for the creation of permanent machinery to uphold and support the enlargement given to the Monroe Doctrine.

This is done on the principle, firmly and forcefully asserted, that the American republics are an international community which acts integrally and forcefully. This community, it is further argued, has the international juridical capacity to act in matters affecting continental unity and security.

As has already been observed in these columns, the enunciation of this principle of international unity, together with measures to make that unity effective, is equivalent to the establishment of an American League of Nations. It is immaterial that the administration is not asserting that this development is its purpose. Deeds are more important than words.

And the deeds at Habana clearly point to the quiet establishment of a league which will be less ambitious, but may also have more of the characteristics of a superstate, than the ill-fated Geneva organization.

The third significant aspect of the collective trusteeship convention is found in the accord which it has brought between the viewpoints of the United States and of the Argentine. To have reconciled these different viewpoints, representing fundamental divergencies of national interest, is a great tribute to the diplomatic skill of Secretary Hull. The magnitude of his accomplishment is only emphasized by the importance of the issue on which Argentine agreement was finally secured.

It is true that the Argentine delegation has taken occasion to state that signature of the convention at Habana will not necessarily commit the Government in Buenos Aires. But, as a matter of fact, that is only stating the obvious. The same condition applies for the United States. None knows better than Secretary Hull that his signature on this treaty will not bind this country until Senate ratification has given it validity as a governmental action.

The Argentine delegation, it seems, was not so much loath to sign the collective trusteeship convention as it was eager to emphasize the democratic character of its Government. Some of the envoys at Habana were able to commit their semitotalitarian countries by their own personal actions. That does not apply for the Argentine and, by the same token, it does not apply for the United States.

This will be realized more fully when the Senate opens debate on whether or not the treaties we have sponsored at Habana should be ratified. Immediate action is not to be expected, and in some important respects administration policy can follow the lines laid down without Senate approval.

But the latter is nonetheless essential and the treaties should, from this moment, be securing the close senatorial examination to which their vast potential importance entitles them.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Walter Lippmann, which appears in this morning's Washington Post under the headline " 'Total defense' stalled."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of August 1, 1940]

TODAY AND TOMORROW—"TOTAL DEFENSE" STALLED

Last Friday the Washington correspondent of the New York Sun, Mr. Phelps Adams, stated that "that great armada of fighting planes which President Roosevelt promised Congress and the American people more than 2 months ago is not even on order today. The money has been appropriated, the flying services know what they want, the manufacturers are ready to expand, but a confusion of rules has brought about such a snarl that no contracts are expected to be signed for some months."

Mr. Adams went on to say that of the vast sums appropriated for the fiscal year 1941 the War Department has contracted to spend exactly $900,378 on a handful of two-engined advanced training planes, but that no new contracts have been signed for bombers, pursuit, or combat planes of any kind. No one has, or, I think, will, question the accuracy of Mr. Adams' statements; in fact, he could have gone further. For what he reported about aviation contracts is no less true in the absolutely vital matter of expanding the production of armor plate for the Navy and tanks. There, too, the contracts are ready. But they are not signed, and operations, which at best will require years to produce results, have not yet been begun. They have not been begun because the administration and Congress have not cleared the way for them.

It is important to the country that the situation should be understood. For even if this particular obstacle can be removed by a sufficiently loud protest from the country, the state of mind which has produced it will raise up new obstacles. The fact of the matter is that the politicians and the bureaucrats in Washington, while professing to put "total defense" above all other considerations, have not yet seriously begun to put the national defense above all other considerations.

At the moment the great contracts to expand the facilities for producing armaments are stalled over the question of tax amortization. But I am credibly informed that while the Advisory Commission has been struggling with the White House, the Treasury, and Congress to remove the tax obstacle, the Department of Justice has been on the point of launching one of the greatest antitrust suits of all time against the oil industry; it has been getting ready to proceed with a lawsuit which would take years to try and would occupy the attention of the leaders of the industry at the very moment when the executives of that industry are being called upon to use their brains and their energy in organizing to produce synthetic rubber and aviation gasoline and a number of other critical commodities. So whatever the administration's publicity agents may say about it, the fact is that the national defense is not being organiezd with the full, sincere, and single-minded cooperation of the whole Government.

This is a serious charge. But in the light of the known and indisputable facts about the tax-amortization question, which has stalled the airplane and armor-plate contracts, the charge is, I submit, incontrovertible. And though the tax question is a technical one, no expert knowledge of taxation is needed to see what is the trouble in Washington today.

This in simple terms is the problem: In order to make the new warships, the airplanes, and the mechanical equipment for the army, it is necessary to build and equip large additional plants and factories. This requires the investment of new capital, supplied in part by the Government through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and in part by existing aviation, steel, and other companies. As regards the new capital to be supplied by the Government, the problems have, it appears, been solved satisfactorily. But as regards the new capital privately supplied, two questions naturally arise: First the repayment, or debt amortization as it is called, of the borrowed money—a problem which is solved in the prices agreed upon in the contract; and second, the question of how in calculating taxes the depreciation, or tax amortization, shall be calculated. This is the obstacle. For without new legislation the tax requirements are such that the companies will not sign the contracts and go to work.

Now it is not necessary to discuss the rights and wrongs of just how tax amortization ought to be arranged. There is general agreement. What is holding up everything is the fact that the President and the Treasury are insisting upon tying up this particular tax amendment with the larger general question of the taxation of war profits. And since it might take Congress many weeks to write a general tax bill, the simple and indispensable amendment of the existing laws must wait too, and its enactment must depend on a rough-and-tumble political debate about war profits. So the airplanes have to wait, the armor plate has to wait, the Navy has to wait, the Army has to wait for an amendment which everybody agrees is necessary even to begin to arm this Nation.

If some great, disputed principle were involved in the tax-amortization amendment, it would still be wrong to tie it up with and confuse it with all the other questions of war finance. But there is no dispute about the amendment. It has been tied to the disputed question of war finance for no good reason at all unless it be the disgraceful political reason that the tax laws cannot be relaxed at all in favor of business corporations without at the same political moment imposing new taxes on business corporations. Whatever the reason, the fact remains that a technical change in the tax laws is being held up even though the whole armament program is stalled in the process. Whatever the reason, it is not a reason arising out of a wholehearted purpose to arm this Nation rapidly.

Perhaps the administration can be induced to reverse itself on the matter, and let the contracts be signed. But that will not be enough. For new obstacles will arise as long as the President and the administration and Congress, including leaders of both parties, and the country do not acquire the conviction that the task of arming is urgent and serious and that it cannot be done slowly, half-heartedly, and by men who are not really interested in it to the exclusion of every political consideration.

Such a state of mind does not as yet exist in Washington, and unless the country wakes up and then wakes up its politicians, it is headed for the rudest shocks and most unpleasant experiences in its history. For the fact of the matter is that the Nation is passive unnecessarily and inexcusably, while its vital security is at stake in the great battles for the control of the seas. The fact of the matter is that the country is assuming obligations and responsibilities which are inescapable but are tremendous. The fact is that the country is not seriously preparing itself. The administration, which is supposed to realize how critical and urgent is the problem of our defense, is, as we have seen, trifling with the armament program. And the Republican opposition in Congress, if one is to judge by its articulate spokesmen, is fast asleep and sunk in dreams of a world that no longer exists.

Thus far the record is not one which the politicians concerned will be able to stand upon when, as is certain, the country eventually calls them to account.

Training of Manpower

EDITORIAL FROM LIBERTY MAGAZINE

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Bernarr Macfadden editorial which is to appear in Liberty on August 17 be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD. Bernarr Macfadden is known to all as perhaps the most outstanding exponent in America of physical culture and health, and his editorial on this vital subject is very timely. The author was kind enough to send it to me in advance of its appearance in his famous magazine.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[To be inserted in Liberty of August 17, 1940]

HOW LONG, O LORD, HOW LONG?

How long will we have to wait for Congress to take some action in building the one asset needed for the preservation of this Nation?

I again refer to manpower, and it cannot be reiterated too often. In the last 50 years I have repeatedly warned my own countrymen and the English-speaking world generally of the dangers we are facing in neglecting this momentous requirement.

Germany has smashed France with her "blitzkrieg"—due largely to manpower. Yes, there were mechanized units, but the courage and the stamina, the ruggedness that comes from physical upbuilding, were the real source of these victories.

Just read this quotation from a letter I received from a young German:

"Before the last war the sports in Germany were not so important, but when the last war was lost for Germany, the sports—all kinds of them—became very important, even in every small village. They built football arenas and swimming pools, very often against the wishes of the old-timers, who could not understand the new times."

To wage a successful war there must be fighting spirit, keen, even frantic enthusiasm, grim, relentless determination, the will to struggle at times with ruthless violence, regardless of the difficulties.

Such extraordinary powers come largely from superabundant physical force, superior muscular and vital energy, a heart trained to stand the strain, with great bodily vigor throbbing with vibrant life.

Now Congress has voted billions for the Army, for ships and planes, but the millions of men required to man these mechanized units, and the added millions that are required behind the lines—what is being done to train them?

Every man and every woman must do his or her part, and these millions must begin immediately to make the sacrifices necessary to prepare for the battles that we will undoubtedly have to fight.

As a beginning, we should at this time, without delay, register every male citizen in this country from 16 to 40 years of age. This should be done now—not a month or 3 months hence. Such a registration could be accomplished in a few days. The radio chains and the newspapers of this country should receive a governmental mandate which would compel them to publicize a simple questionnaire that every man should fill out and mail to Washington. When these answers are received there should be experts trained to answer them intelligently by return mail, giving definite instructions to each individual, which should include a chart of simple exercises, adapted to individual needs, regulated by the vital conditions as indicated by the answers to the questionnaire.

Strict adherence to such training would harden and strengthen the body throughout every part. These exercises could be taken at home, although ultimately there should be classes arranged for this purpose everywhere.

Such a plan would raise the physical status of the manhood of this country to an extraordinary degree within a few months.

We have been taking everything for granted. We have been accepting the freedom, the extraordinary privileges secured in this country without an atom of appreciation; but to retain them, definite sacrifices will be necessary, and when every citizen is made to realize his duty in helping to meet this emergency, it will add quite materially to his understanding and appreciation of what this country has done for him.

Shortly following this training procedure of those from 16 to 40 years of age, there should be a registration of those from 40 to 50 years of age, and 50 to 60 years of age. They, too, should be willing to make the sacrifices necessary to preserve the freedom that Americanism has brought us.

Many of our young men will be suffering from diseases of various kinds, but the revolutionary changes in the healing art have brought simple measures for effecting cures in but a short time. Physicians familiar with such methods could effectively manage these difficulties.

If our citizens could begin this hardening process in 6 months, literally millions would be ready to take the military training required.

Congress can pass a bill that will put this plan to work immediately. Why wait a week, or even a day? Do it now. There never has been and never will be anything before Congress that is more important than the building up of American manhood to meet the present tragic emergency.

BERNARR MACFADDEN.

Sound Principles of International Trade

ARTICLE BY ROBERT W. VANDERPOEL

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Robert V. Vanderpoel, financial editor of the Chicago Herald-American, entitled "Americans Must Learn Quickly Sound Principles of International Trade."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Chicago Herald-American of July 29, 1940]

AMERICANS MUST LEARN QUICKLY SOUND PRINCIPLES OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

(By Robert P. Vanderpoel, financial editor)

There has never been a time in the history of this country when it has been so important that the people have a clear realization of sound principles of foreign trade and exchange as at this moment.

Unfortunately, such an understanding is woefully lacking.

It is true that we have made some progress in this direction in recent years, but it has been slow, painfully slow, and today events are moving fast, breathtakingly fast.

German Economic Minister Walther Funk may have made one of those psychological mistakes for which the Germans are famous when he attempted to break up the Habana conference with the threat that Nazi-dominated Europe, with unity of economic control, would deal only with individual, free, and sovereign states of South America.

NAZIS NEED AMERICAS

Great efforts have been made to convince the people of this hermisphere that they need Germany. It is true that cooperative effort is always the most beneficial for all. But it is Germany, Europe, that needs this hemisphere, first and foremost.

It has been predicted that millions in Europe will starve this winter. They will starve for the foodstuffs of the Americas.

NO STARVATION HERE

The economics of the American nations may be upset as a result of the war's disturbance to international trade, but people will not starve on this side of the ocean.

Who needs who?

Europe needs America. The Germans know this, but they know, too, that if they can prevent, through threats and blustering, unified action in this hemisphere they can outbargain each individual or each nation through their concentration of control.

Thus it is that they are using every effort to prevent an economic arrangement here by voluntary action comparable to the one that Hitler is determined to force upon Europe through threats and conquest.

HIT UNITED STATES WEAK SPOT

While Funk's position was inconsistent, arrogant, and offensive, he did hit upon the weak spot in the American picture and the thing that even today is making the task of the representatives of this country at Habana difficult. Funk declared:

"If the United States wishes to contribute again to the shaping of a world economy it must abandon its false methods of wishing to be the greatest creditor country and at the same time the greatest exporting nation. These are things that cannot be reconciled."

Every economist the world over knows that this is true. Some of our statesmen, notably Secretaries Hull and Wallace, know that it is true.

But too many American people, lacking in economic knowledge, confused by false advisers, listening to selfish pressure groups, have not understood, and as a result too many of our politicians have followed mistaken paths, paths that have created world trouble and unless deserted quickly now threaten world cataclysm.

Aid for Defense of British Isles

ARTICLES BY HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR., OF WISCONSIN, AND COL. HENRY BRECKINRIDGE

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD articles written for the American Forum by Col. Henry Breckinridge and myself on the topic Should We Fight the Nazis to Defend the British Isles?

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN FORUM: SHOULD WE FIGHT THE NAZIS TO DEFEND THE BRITISH ISLES?

THE QUESTION

(By Theodore Granik, Director, the American Forum)

As this is written, the eyes of the world anxiously watch news reports of an imminent Nazi invasion—another "blitzkrieg" by military might determined to make a shambles of the British homeland.

Heartsick peoples everywhere read the headline "Politicians vote end of French Republic." France has caved in—"Liberty, equality, fraternity" are no more. The nation which to our generation has been so much a symbol of democracy, has joined the dictatorships.

What will happen to Great Britain? How will the outcome affect America and American democracy? What should—and can—we do?

Some have urged that every nation in the Western Hemisphere should immediately declare war on Hitler. They maintain that those now fighting him are fighting our battle. Others contend, however, that our entrance into the war would be a tragic mistake for us. It would mean an end to our democracy and do little to save it abroad.

The question of war or peace is no longer mere theory; the actual decision may have to be made by the American people, and made soon. Herewith are the views of two prominent Americans, written exclusively for the American Forum.

YES, SAYS BRECKINRIDGE

(By Col. Henry Breckinridge, former Assistant Secretary of War)

The United States should prevent the conquest of the British Isles by the Nazi.

For a quarter century American policy has been built on the holding of the Pacific by the American Fleet and the holding of the Atlantic by the British Fleet.

Britain is the last bastion between us and the conquering dictators. If she goes down, we face them alone. If we permit it, we shall deserve and suffer every baleful consequence of the disaster.

Hitler's jackal, Mussolini, gave the warning in his formal declaration of war. This gigantic battle, he said, is only a phase in the destruction of the "plutocratic democracies" of the west, who hoard the natural resources of the earth and sit on a pile of all its gold. Well, we are the particular "plutocratic democracy" of the west that sits on the pile of gold, twenty billions of it, 80 percent of the world's supply.

The well-known final goal of nazi-ism and fascism operating in Spain is the reconstitution of the Spanish Empire. Spain is to be the front. Nazi military might and organizing ability will be the real drive behind the conquest and the subsequent exploitation of the illimitable natural resources of South America. The millions of "fifth columnists" will do their stint in South America as they have done elsewhere.

The Nazi agent, the "fifth column" man, the sincere pacifist, the shallow military follower of the cult of Nazi invincibility, the defeatist—each is playing his role here and now. They did it successfully in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and even in France and England. The Munich umbrella well may be the immutable symbol of the dying democracies of the world. America has its Quislings.

"DO NOTHING" POLICIES

The isolationists tell us at each stage of the discussion that we must do nothing, or can do nothing, at the moment. A year and a half ago it was that we must build no planes until there be research. Ten months ago we must build none until there be a meticulous definition of our foreign policy in all its details. One month ago we must do nothing until the elaboration of a great plan.

They tell us that America has nothing to do with Europe's wars; that there is nothing to choose between the Nazi and democracy; that the broad Atlantic and Pacific are our impassable barriers against the wars of Europe and Asia.

Seven years ago Italo Balbo, now dead, a better man than Hitler's jackal, made the first air reconnaissance in flying from Rome to Chicago. He made it easily and successfully with 24 planes. He used the well-known stepping stones—Iceland and Greenland—easy hops for every type of modern military plane.

Now the Nazi has conquered Denmark, who owns Iceland and Greenland. Now the Nazi has conquered Holland and France, who own islands off our northern coast—islands girdling the Carribean—and large areas on the very mainland of America. As for Asia, it is 55 miles from America across the Bering Strait, not 6,000 miles across the Pacific.

War is a terrible thing. The resources of the earth could yield a bountiful living for all if peace and the Golden Rule prevailed. But the die has been cast otherwise.

A modern Genghis Khan marches to universal conquest, universal destruction, and universal slavery. The old Genghis Khan placed a pyramid of human skulls every few miles on his post roads as a warning to those who would resist his will. The modern Genghis Khan looses from the air the thunderbolts of obliteration on whole populations. Having disarmed the conquered, he holds them in complete subjugation by airplane, tank, and Gestapo. If he is not defeated before the conquest becomes universal, his victims will be slaves, not for a while but forever. Disarmed men cannot revolt successfully against tanks and bombers.

Our Quislings and their assorted allies say, "We cannot fight; we could not do anything effective if we would—even if we had the vision, the courage to see the fatal import of the present hour and act." But the very ceaseless activities of these Quislings indicate they still have a slight lingering fear that we may act in the end like our ancestors at Gettysburg and Valley Forge, like Charles Martel at Tours in 732, like the Greeks at Thermopylae and Marathon.

WHAT WE CAN DO

Is there nothing we could do?

1. We could mobilize our merchant ships, convoy them with warships, and bring the children of Britain to the refuge of our shores. Not to suffer the little children to come to us now would be to deny our every heritage of humanity.

2. We could send 1,000 volunteer pursuit pilots to the air fields of Britain.

Let us not be deluded about our air forces. We have 4,000 of the finest military and naval pilots in the world. They would knock the Nazi bombers out of the air like vultures struck by lightning. In equal combat the British have universally bested the Nazi airmen in the present war. One thousand American pilots in Britain would turn the tide of war.

3. Stir the power of this Nation to action! Mobilize its productive activity! Outmatch every diabolical machine Hitler can contrive! Take the Nazi out of his cross-country locomotive and he is no better than any other man, and not so good as some. Match him in the air with equal numbers of planes flown by free men and he will soon be back on the ground. If he asks for it, put him at the other end of the bead drawn from an American bomb sight, and see if he can stand the punishment which he mercilessly metes out to others.

The cult of the invinciblity of the Nazi is a myth. America has the material resources and organizing genius to be invincible and irresistible, but prompt and courageous action is the cost even of survival. The British Isles are our last outpost against the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse. If we permit Britain to go down without a struggle, history will record in yellow letters of shame the failure of American intelligence and courage in the most fatal crisis of modern history. Would the America of Lincoln let "government of the people, by the people, for the people" perish from the earth?

NO! SAYS LA FOLLETTE

(By ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR., United States Senator from Wisconsin)

It would be a tragic mistake to go to war to defend the British Isles. That would take us into the total European conflict on all fronts. Once before we went to Europe to save democracy; Italy, Japan, and Russia were our allies then. With rapidly shifting alliances we might soon be fighting Frenchmen or be allied again with Russia. We would be going into war blind as to the future.

The way to save democracy now is to save it here. The first casualty after we declared war would be our own democracy. Modern war cannot be fought successfully under democratic control. France and England have learned this sad lesson, written in the blood of brave patriots.

America in war would create a dictatorship for its duration. Our Government would be drastically altered for an indefinite time to come. We would betray our heritage of democracy by entrance into the war—unprepared as we are—and do nothing effective to save democracy abroad.

We must recognize that democracy will not and cannot take a nation through complete chaos. With manpower decimated, capital and producing units in ruins, hunger and pestilence rampant, Europe will be in chaos after this war. Let no man, therefore, believe we can preserve democracy at home or abroad merely by going to war to defend the British Isles.

PRICE OF WAR

However our hearts may ache, it is time to use our heads. However idealistic our motive, it is the plain, ordinary people who will pay the cost of war. They paid last time in blood, treasure, and bitter disillusionment. They will pay again.

Through 1938 the cash costs of our participation in World War No. 1 was $47,247,000,000. This does not include the Allied war debt, which will never be repaid. With interest, this is over $12,211,000,000—or a grand total of $59,458,000,000—which our last effort "to make the world safe for democracy" cost the people of this country.

Yet those enormous figures do not tell half the story. We must add to them most of our staggering governmental bills since 1929. The after effects of World War No. 1 finally took their toll on the Nation's whole economic life, through loss of markets abroad, the dislocation and wartime expansion of our major industries, cotton textiles, lumber, coal, and agriculture. Deflation of these industries finally caused the collapse of the Nation's purchasing power.

What we have suffered in the loss of human values and material wealth as a result of our last misadventure in Europe will be as nothing compared to the economic consequences all our people will suffer if we go to war to defend the British Isles.

BRITAIN'S MISTAKES

We cannot remedy the mistakes made by Great Britain during the last 22 years in both foreign and domestic policy. What is happening now was decided long before September 3, 1939. It is tragic to see France defeated and brave Englishmen fighting against odds. But, powerful as we are, we have not the strength to reverse the running of the European sands of time; and it takes time to train men, to put people to work producing wealth, and to turn out mechanized implements of war.

Another lesson we must learn from the tragic events in Europe is that arms and implements of war are not enough to make a nation strong. The cruel fact has been driven home to a shocked world that a nation with a dynamic, expanding economy can smash a nation or a combination of nations in which manpower, capital, human and natural resources are not at work producing real wealth. It would be fatal to let our abhorrence of the brutalitarian revolution in Germany blind us to this vital fact.

We cannot preserve democracy at home or abroad by going to war to try to defend the British Isles. The only realistic way we can now serve the ultimate cause of democracy in the world is to turn our energies to the creation of a dynamic expanding economy under our own democratic form of government. We have a responsibility to our nation and this hemisphere which will require our full and undivided energies and resources.

PROGRAM FOR "DYNAMIC AMERICA"

I propose the following foreign and domestic policies based on our vital national interest:

1. Stay out of foreign overseas wars, including one to defend the British Isles.

2. A sound national defense which will protect this Nation and defend this hemisphere from the Arctic Circle to Cape Horn against all comers. A tax plan which will prevent fat profits being made from such a program.

3. Build an economy not only on this continent but in this hemisphere, which will give us the necessary stimulus for prosperity and utilize the full energies and resources of our people.

4. Utilize our idle manpower, productive capacity, and idle capital not required for national defense to restore our national resource base, to rehabilitate and conserve our human resources.

Here is a program which will give us a dynamic America and restore that equality of economic opportunity which characterized the development of our own physical frontier. It will give the farmer a decent living and restore farming as a way of life.

It will provide the opportunity to those who work in shop, store, office, and factory to earn a decent and secure living, by assuring to every able-bodied American useful and productive employment at a living wage.

This program will assure a national plan to provide generous, adequate, and self-respecting security for those who, because of age or other disability, are unable to provide for themselves.

It will end the unpardonable crime of denying opportunity to the Nation's most precious asset—its youth.

Here is a program which will give this generation "a rendezvous with destiny" in this hemisphere instead of with death in some other. It will make and keep democracy safe for America.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. CLAUDE PEPPER, OF FLORIDA, AT HARVARD UNIVERSITY

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me on July 30, 1940, under the auspices of American defense group of Harvard University.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My friends and fellow Americans, as I stand here in Cambridge, I find my mind turning to ancient history, to the graphic picture of an ancient world, which lingers tenaciously in my memory—a quiet, peaceful, little agitated world. The antique world upon which my reflection centers is the world of the year 1924 when I graduated from the Harvard Law School.

In this great university at that time there were many men, masters of much knowledge; men of unique vision, with almost the gift of prophecy. Yet I wonder who of that world would venture to say that he was able to see 16 years ahead to this sad world of 1940.

Who could have believed what you and I have seen happen in 5 years, in 2 years, in 9 months, in 10 weeks? Who would have dared to claim it possible to alter the character of the world, the destiny perhaps of mankind, the security of this great Nation in 3 months?

Here where genius has given birth to so many miracles; where have been carved so many magic wands which gave an easy mastery over the potent forces of nature, who would have thought that venerated science could gain such a pyrrhic victory.

Yet the dullest mind knows that his world has been caught in the crush of dynamic forces and shattered into many incongruous fragments. One wonders almost if he is sane when such ugly images form on the retina of his mind if he dare lift his eye to the horizon. One thinks he even sees scorpions of doubt crawling over dogmas, faiths, and philosophies, even upon the pages of Holy Writ which tell of the sovereignty of God and the dignity of man. Into one's mind creep insuppressible misgivings about the integrity of human character and the quality of human worth.

Things refuse to be rational, to take on any natural shape to which we are accustomed. Life has lost pattern, and men stumble along an uncertain way; the balance of their mind disturbed; the delicate mechanism of their governance unsettled. One feels that he is lost on a slippery surface, moved along by sinister forces which he can neither guide nor restrain.

Paradox rears its peculiar head everywhere. The greatest cruelty is found in an age which has achieved the greatest charity man has ever known. The most widespread slavery history recalls sobs in a world which knows the most complete freedom of all time. The strongest will abides in a world rent with the breaking of the weakest wills. Courage shares our time with outrageous cowardice. Men who hold their course like the compass needle must share the reins which guide a nation's course with flabby appeasers.

Yet chaos, unruly forces, incongruous fragments, facts which refuse to be rational have been the fallow ground from which men of skill, vision, patience, and courage have always brought forth the great things of the world. Men have always had to contend with destructive forces, to harness them, to curb their damage, and eventually to exterminate them. Men have always rallied against danger, pooling their forces, coordinating their efforts, marshalling their wills to win. The terrible anger of outraged right has always been a devastating force.

What concerns you and me now is whether our generation of men and women, of boys and girls, is to be an exception or whether we are worthy of that noble past which has many times moved through the dark valleys but always marched on to the light, which has met many evil forces but always mastered them.

Let me congratulate the American defense, group of Harvard University. You are a spearhead of your generation's effort. You are one of those forging the weapons which shall break the shackles upon our security, our standard of living, the worship of God, and the rights of man. All over America, all over this hemisphere, all over the world, though in many places stealthily, other men and women of all ages are propagating the same sentiments which you are generating here.

Your objectives are comprehensive. You are advancing upon a broad front. You are singularly fitted to give especial leadership to the great effort which the occasion demands, for you know that the first duty that leadership has is to see clearly what is to be done. What is our problem? Tell us what is right and then we will know what is our duty. Tell us whether there is merit in these strange claims that are made; whether there is justice in these novel demands; whether there is justification for this so-called world revolution. If not, tell us how fiendish it is. And if that be the truth, tell us that it is the ugly head of age-old tyranny rising up again through the earth blood soaked endless times with its destruction.

Tell us, you who teach, what of all that we have gained in the ages' struggle is worth keeping, even at the price of our lives. Where shall we make our stand to fight and where shall we yield up the corrupt?

Tell us, you who lead, who is with us, whose interests lie with ours and with whom do our interests lie. Who are the beneficiaries of this vast inheritance which the past has bequeathed? Who has enough stake in it to defend it? Is it for all that we have preserved these good things, or is it for only a few?

How much shall we pay to keep what we have, to gain the hope of better? Is lip service enough? Is time enough? Is money enough? Is labor enough? Is life too much?

You who think, tell us also, what is the alternative to the dictator's world; what kind of a world do you want; what kind of a world ought we to have? Is the present the best you can offer in place of the world the dictators want? What has your world to offer to the individual in health and strength, in family happiness, in security—security against harm, security against poverty, security against fear?

What has your world to offer against war and the causes of war; against international anarchy and brigandage; against the constant class of over-zealous nationalisms; against the stresses and the strains of peoples historically crowded into abnormal barriers; against the pull of forces across artificial boundaries?

Is your concept of democracy so vital that its very exuberance throws the lie into the despots' charge of decadence? Can you tell us, you who study, how men and women, boys and girls, may regain their enthusiasm for the democratic life so that they shall speak of it with that pride and satisfaction which comes from a knowledge that they share a great trust?

Can you tell us where we may draw the line in a democratic state between liberty and restraint? How much can we settle a share of the whole responsibility upon each without losing the character of a free people? How much can we coordinate our efforts, pool our strength, marshal our wills and still be a liberty-loving people?

In this chaotic day the demand is primarily for those who can think through to some rational conclusion; who can properly appraise the issues and the causes at stake; who can keep a clear view of what we are aiming at and not lose sight of the purpose of the struggle in the means by which it is carried on.

And if you can, tell us what is this strange paralysis which has gripped the wills of our generation and made it resist not even when its vitals are attacked? Is this the dreaded new weapon fashioned in some fiendish mind? Is the right to worship God according to one's conscience no longer worth preserving? Is man no longer a rational being worth saving? Is human dignity a false claim not worth defending? Are these things which we call the mind and the spirit, the gentler subtle forces of the world, frills and furbelows, the appendixes of civilization? How could a substantial number of people, how could any leader trusted with authority and duty, question these fundamentals of the life we know?

Yet, you and I know that those who do not see, and worse the appeaser who thinks so little of his brother's blood that he would grip the hand that took it; who so ignores his ancestor's sacrifices that he would embrace the principle that slew him, those who cry "Peace" when there is no peace with evil; those who cry "Stay" when we are already too late, are in every city, town, and hamlet, in both Houses of Congress, writing books and publishing newspapers, and some while their breasts are still warm from a tyrant's embrace daring to counsel a brave people over the radio.

Amid the fearful uncertainties of this dangerous hour, dare you and I not speak candidly and fearlessly to each other and to our countrymen? The American people are a brave people, able to stand steadfast against the shock of truth, to meet courageously the challenge of trial.

Let us, therefore, unceasingly tell the American people some ugly facts.

1. The United States of America is in greater physical danger than it has been since it gained its independence. It is possible for a combination of existing world forces who have reason to desire our downfall seriously to threaten our security. Other nations of the world inimical to our interests have military and mechanical forces which if they were landed in this country we are unable to meet. If the British Navy were destroyed or should fall into the hands of an enemy, such an enemy could marshal naval forces which would prove vastly superior to our naval forces and could attack either Continental United States or its Territories at places which could not be adequately defended.

2. The Western Hemisphere is in greater physical danger than it has been at any other time since the establishment of the Monroe Doctrine. The Hydrographic Service of the United States Government reports that the total coast line from the northern part of Iceland around the eastern boundary of North, Central, and South America, past the Horn, and up the western boundary of this hemisphere to the Arctic Circle is 43,000 miles. I believe it to be true that with the British Navy out of consideration that hemisphere cannot be defended successfully against possible and potential enemies of the United States by the existing naval forces of the United States or forces which can be brought into being and effectiveness inside a period of 10 years.

3. The internal stability, the economic strength of the Western Hemisphere is more uncertain today than it has been in the history of this country. The Western Hemisphere cannot maintain its present economic organization and preserve its present standard of living with Europe economically cut off from it. A high authority in the United States Government has made to me the statement that "The wolf is really at the door of America." Farm prices are now being held by the United States Government approximately 20 percent above the world market. We are not the natural market for the principal commodities of South America. They have been accustomed to take only about one-third of our exports and to give us about one-third of theirs. To reestablish commerce with a Europe dominated by Hitler means to abandon gold as the medium and measure of world trade, to enter into a barter system agreeable to Hitler's demands, and to meet any conditions dictatorship may choose to impose. It means joining hands with our mortal enemy and helping to keep alive the forces which have destroyed these things which have made the world worth living in to us and shattered the foundations of our own prosperity, security, and happiness.

4. Democracy cannot survive as we now know it in this hemisphere—in this Nation—if the world continues as the dictators have now made it and if dictatorship as it now exists still lives. A free economy, free lives will have to be sacrificed to totalitarianism in order to meet totalitarianism, or we shall perish before totalitarianism. All the incidents of dictatorship abroad will be here in the United States—inflation, forced loans from the public, Government price fixing, Government freezing of wages and people in their jobs, shifting of population to Government-designated areas, forced residence on farms, strict Government-controlled agriculture, the suppression of personal liberties—if practically all of the rest of the world lies prostrate under the cruel feet of modern dictatorship. A world can no more exist half slave and half free than can a nation. Free private enterprise, free exchange of goods and services, free lives cannot exist in such an order.

5. Intellectual life as we know it today cannot live in a world dominated by modern dictatorship. Research, creative writing, constructive thinking, seeking after new worlds of the mind are stifled in the brutality of the totalitarian state. The intellectual inheritance of the ages would first be prostituted and then repudiated.

6. The spiritual values, those potent unreal but moving forces which have wrought civilization out of the base past would be strangled like an unwanted baby aborning. Man would lose his grasp upon the divine hand which has guided him through the dark eras and fall into an endless night. The soul shorn of its wings, would spend eternity like a base serpent condemned to crawl upon the earth.

Can there be any division in counsel as to whether your country and mine will suffer any force upon earth even to threaten us with that kind of a life?

"Is life so dear or peace so sweet" as to be purchasable in modern America "at the price of chains and slavery"?

Are we unwilling to risk some danger to avoid a surer death and a more certain destruction? Should we cringe behind some fancied screen either too blind to see devastation all around us, or too selfish to aid the common friend against the common foe?

Shall we let the inheritance of freedom be stricken from the hope of our children by a few arrogant men who have sworn our destruction without even a show of courage as a testament to them? Shall we speak only in soothing and honeyed words to a people whose whole character has been rooted in the foundation of forthrightness, courage, and determination?

I know that the people know what is going on in their world and what is being done to their world and who is doing it and why they are doing it, and who proposes to defend their world and those who are unworthy of trust in it.

I propose, therefore, that this sturdy defense group of Harvard University, in the age-old tradition of this institution, blaze a fresh trail in the thought of America. Let it be clear. Let it be straight. Let it go unerringly to its goal. Let this group propose to the American people this declaration of faith and purpose:

1. We believe in God and we will defend the right to worship Him according to the dictates of one's conscience.

2. We proudly redeclare that man is a rational and dignified being and that he who enslaves him profanes God's highest handiwork.

3. We will defend with all we have our country, our continent, our way of life, our standard of living, and the right to approach all men everywhere for a free exchange of sentiments, goods, and services.

4. As a part of the moral right of self-defense we inform all men that we will resist the conquest of Great Britain as inimical to our own security.

5. To our prayers for peace we will add our good offices to all men toward bringing about a just peace upon democratic principles in Europe or Asia.

6. That we honor the memory of all Americans who have contributed to the creation of a system which would help to bring about a law-abiding world, and we will assume an honorable part in an effort to bring about a world condition where wrong may be redressed and redressable and justice under law may become an international practice.

In an earlier day our forefathers combed all the past for the framework of what they built here. They did not fear to seek new material and to build a new structure without any counterpart in all the world. How well their courage and confidence have been vindicated is attested by a nation which has not been approximated in history. Now is a time for new pioneering. As the wild forces of nature were once harnessed upon this continent, so must the tumultuous and violent forces of a mad world be brought to a new obedience to those higher precepts which man has dreamed.

This Nation was consciously built. So must a new world be. The pattern of this Government never came into being by negation or equivocation or emasculating timidity. It grew out of a bold dream under the persistent urge of indomitable wills that dared to do what God and judgment told them was right. It is time for America to stir itself out of its apathy, to break the shackles which have strangled its moral sense to be done with weaklings and twisted-minded patriots or sinister opportunists. It is time, high time, for America to be her old self again and Americans to be worthy of their name.

Within almost a stone's throw from where we stand the blood of patriots was spilled in the holy cause of liberty and freedom for a God-loving people. Those heroes had no assurances that an army would form at their side, and that a scattered people would so unite in strength that their's might assume the dignity of a great cause. Yet so did the zeal of their spirit arouse the whole country that soon a citizen of far-off Virginia assumed command of the Continental Army within sight of where these men of Massachusetts died.

The spirit of those men who, too, loved life and freedom—loved them so much that they were willing to die for them—still pulses through the hearts of Americans. Nor have Americans lost that moral sense that men of Massachusetts peculiarly possessed and builded into the institutions of this Nation. No brazen tyrant can suppress the determination of the people of America to denounce murder, bloody conquest, heinous wrong, wherever it be, nor restrain this moral sense of America from demanding right and justice and throwing its weight and heart-uttered benediction with those who defend them.

All America needs is bold, fearless, unyielding leadership which knows it is on God's side and cares about nothing else.

Of you men and women of Harvard the times demand such new leadership; for where better than from these monuments that honor patriots' graves, than from these books which tell the epic of patriots' sacrifices, than from these halls where human rationality and dignity have been taught, than from the shades of these trees from which Washington went forth to wage war against the tyranny of his day, could come a clear call to the people of America to awake and be about the stern business of defending the ramparts they love.

Old-Age Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

LETTER FROM MRS. LILLIAN L. VAN BURGH

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, last February a gentle old lady, of Casper, Wyo., whom I have known for several years, wrote me, in response to a holiday letter, a very eloquent and moving letter on old-age pensions from the point of view of a mother. Several of my friends saw copies of the communication, and all were impressed by it, as was I. I have now been requested to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is worthy of such recognition.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that the letter of Mrs. Lillian L. Van Burgh, of Casper, Wyo., to me may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CASPER, WYO., February 1940.

Senator J. C. O'MAHONEY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: I was much pleased to receive your Christmas greetings letter. Knowing what a busy man you are, it was all the more pleasing to know you had not forgotten the short talk we had last summer regarding my young grandson, who now informs me he still wants to go to Annapolis if possible. He is a sophomore at State University, Berkeley, Calif. I am anxious to help the lad all I can, and will be more grateful than I can say for anything you may be able to do regarding an appointment. Some time I may be able to return the favor. (Strange things are happening in this old topsy-turvy world of ours.)

Now, Senator, I am going to ask you to, please, talk with Dr. Townsend. You will like him, I know, and I am also sure he will show you, in his simple, clear way, that the plan is sound, and will bring our country back on its old solid foundation once more; for you must realize, as we all are now doing, that our beloved Nation is tottering too close to an unthinkable abyss. To you men in Washington, our Senators and Congressmen, we have given the power to show the way to prevent such disaster to our country.

I was a voting delegate to the three last national conventions, and I know what the Townsend plan is and what it will do for me.

Senator, could you visualize your own dear mother—if she is still with you—an object of charity, or in the home of one of her children? No matter how kind they may be, it is not her own home. She is not queen of that hive. No hive ever has two queens.

God intended it to be so. After long years of independence, laboring happily for her loved ones, striving to form in each child principles and characters that will make them a credit to her and their country—for that is what we mothers are for, to give our country good, honorable, law-abiding citizens. I have given three, and so far not one has caused me to regret their birth. When her task is finished, and they no longer really need her, and perhaps under present conditions the children can scarcely provide for their own, too often she finds herself alone, homeless, with no means now to purchase the things she had longed for during the years when the children needed so much. How she had longed to travel, to see the wonderful places of which she had read! If she could only run away where no one she knew could ever see her again, or—"Dear Father, if I could just die!" No, Senator; that could not be your mother, thank God; but it could be and is thousands of mothers today in this glorious(?) land of ours.

Every mother, so long as she can walk, wants her own home and independence. No matter how fine or good her children may be, no mother wants to be compelled to become a member of their home. Mother is living in a different generation. Their lives, their ways, are not hers.

Can you not see, dear Senator, what the Townsend plan would mean to us, your senior citizens of this Nation, the sound foundation of which we laid for you of the present generation to build upon?

Please study the plan, and I know you will vote right. If you return to Wyoming soon, I hope I may have the pleasure of meeting you again. I seem to have as many political friends among the Democrats as among my own Republicans.

Please pardon this too-long letter. I guess I thought you were "one of my boys" to whom I was talking. Often they come to "Mother Van" with their problems.

Most sincerely,

MRS. LILLIAN L. VAN BURGH.

Decline and Rise of United States Naval Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Decline and Rise of United States Naval Power, 1921–40," with the accompanying tables.

There being no objection, the article and accompanying tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DECLINE AND RISE OF UNITED STATES NAVAL POWER, 1921–40

In 1921 the United States had, in ships built and building, the most powerful navy in the world. There were 536 ships in the combatant categories, the tonnage of which was 2,134,497 tons. Manning this number one fleet of the world were 134,237 trained officers and men. Available to repair and replace units of this fleet as they became over age was a shipbuilding industry such as the Nation had not had before. It had established a world record never since equaled of constructing a destroyer in 45½ working days. The quality of its product is attested by the hundred-odd over-age destroyers still doing valuable service.

But it was not for long that we held our place as first among the navies of the world. Late in 1921, under the leadership of our Government, a disarmament conference met in Washington. After the disarmament conference, work stopped on most of our naval vessels under construction. Shipbuilding plants closed down one by one. Their skilled artisans scattered to the four corners of the land. The building ways rotted and rusted.

We disposed of or demilitarized 31 capital ships including 7 new battleships and 4 new battle cruisers which averaged 28 percent completed. One of the battleships, the Washington, was 75.9 percent, or nearer completion than the Washington which was launched in Philadelphia June 1 of this year. Approximately $277,000,000 were sacrificed in the scrapping of ships under this treaty. With those ships we would today have a more powerful battle line than we can hope to have in the next 6 years.

Of the 20 older capital ships disposed of, only 2 were then over age by our present standards and some were little past the halfway mark toward obsolescence.

Our total tonnage disposed of or demilitarized under the Washington Treaty was 767,880 tons, compared to Great Britain's 447,750 and Japan's 355,730. We were no longer the world's largest naval power.

But in 1930 we agreed to dispose of 3 more capital ships plus 203 cruisers, destroyers, and submarines, or a total of 206 ships of 331,109 tons. This brought the total naval combatant ships disposed of or demilitarized to 237 of a total tonnage of 1,098,989 tons. Thus we reduced the Nation's naval defense by a fleet almost as large as our entire fleet today.

By 1933 we had dropped below Great Britain, below Japan, and even below France in the number of under-age combatant ships. The numbers were Great Britain 138, Japan 184, France 124, and United States 101. Even on a tonnage basis we were in a relatively weak position in under-age combatant vessels. Great Britain had 980,169 tons, Japan 726,138 tons, and we had 728,000 tons. The average age of our under-age ships being older than Japan's, we were actually in third place in over-all fighting power.

It was not only the sacrifice of ships under the treaty agreements which brought us to the unfavorable relative strength which we had in 1933, when we began to rebuild our Navy. The treaties allowed us to build ships as replacements, but we didn't build them. Of some 150 combatant ships which we were allowed to lay down between 1922 and 1933, we actually did lay down only 25 and completed 14.

Since 1933 we have laid down and/or contracted for 242 and commissioned 124 combatant vessels. We have under construction now 138 combatant ships and 18 auxiliaries plus 34 motor torpedo boats and submarine chasers, or a total of 190 craft.

In the meantime we have rehabilitated our shipbuilding industry, both private and Government. In 1933 there were 4,969 men employed in shipbuilding in navy yards, and now we have 28,800.

The trained naval personnel in 1933 was 90,334 naval officers and men and 15,927 marine officers and men. We now have 150,451 Navy, including aviation cadets, and 27,542 Marine Corps. The over-all increase in trained personnel has been 63 percent since 1933.

In 1933 we had only 1,066 naval planes. Today we have on hand about 2,100 plus over 2,000 on order, and the efficiency of our naval air arm is unequaled.

SUMMARY—DECLINE

From 1921 until 1933 the naval power of the United States was on the decline. The extent of this weakening of our naval defense is indicated by the following facts:

1. About half of our fighting naval tonnage was disposed of or demilitarized (in accordance with the terms of limitation of armament treaties of 1921–22 and 1930).

2. The United States failed to build the necessary replacement naval vessels allowed under the treaty, having laid down only approximately 17 percent of some 150 combatant vessels needed and allowed.

3. The failure to build these naval vessels contributed to the atrophied condition to which our shipbuilding industry had declined by 1933.

4. Trained naval and Marine Corps personnel was reduced by approximately one-third, necessitating the decommissioning of useful naval vessels and the operation of others with reduced complements.

5. The condition of the auxiliary vessels of the fleet reduced its over-all efficiency and imposed upon it a greatly reduced speed. Not a single auxiliary naval vessel was laid down from 1922 to 1933.

RISE

Early in 1933 the decline in United States naval power reached its turning point and has been on the rise ever since. The extent of improvement of naval strength since 1933 is evidenced by:

1. We have built and commissioned since 1933 more fighting ships than our number of underage ships at the beginning of 1933. In these 7 years we have, in fact, commissioned eight times as many combatant ships as in the 7 years preceding 1933, this despite the unhappy condition of our shipbuilding industry in 1933.

2. Naval shipbuilding has been greatly speeded up. There are now 190 naval craft building. The number of men employed in naval shipbuilding has increased from less than 9,000 to over 75,000.

3. The naval air arm has been doubled and raised to an enviable state of efficiency. A well-thought-out program of naval air bases strategically located in both oceans is well under way.

4. Trained personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps has been increased by over 60 percent.

5. Naval research has been intensified and has already produced far reaching results.

Commodity Credit Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY B. STEAGALL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

LETTERS AND TABLES SHOWING CONDITION OF COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters and tables showing the assets and liabilities of the Commodity Credit Corporation:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 27, 1940.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Pursuant to the provisions of the act approved March 8, 1938 (52 Stat. 107) an act to maintain unimpaired the capital of the Commodity Credit Corporation at $100,000,000, and for other purposes, an appraisal has been made of all the assets and liabilities of said corporation as of March 31, 1940. As a result of such appraisal and on the basis of market prices as of March 31, 1940, it has been determined that the assets of the corporation exceed the liabilities, including capital stock at $100,000,000, by an amount of $43,756,731.01. A report of the committee appointed by me to appraise, on my behalf, the assets and liabilities of the corporation is attached for your information.

In the Budget for the fiscal year 1941, transmitted to the Congress on January 3, 1940, it was estimated that $60,000,000 would be repaid to the Treasury by the Commodity Credit Corporation as a result of the appraisal of its assets as of March 31, 1940. This estimate was made in the fall of 1939 and obviously was subject to a number of factors not under the control of the Commodity Credit Corporation, such as the course of commodity prices between then and March 31, 1940. In February 1940, a further estimate was made of the amount repayable to the Treasury by the Commodity Credit Corporation during the current fiscal year. At that time, on the basis of commodity prices then existing, it was estimated that $75,000,000 would be repaid to the Treasury. Subsequent to such estimate and before March 31, 1940, there was a substantial recession in the prices of commodities on which the corporation had made loans, and additional loans were made by lending agencies under the corporation's commitments to take over such loans. As a result of this situation the amount to be repaid to the Treasury as determined by the appraisal of the corporation's assets as of March 31, 1940, is $43,756,731.01.

The above cited act provides that in the event the net worth of the corporation, as shown by the appraisal by the Secretary of the Treasury, is in excess of $100,000,000, such excess shall, as soon as practicable after such appraisal be deposited in the Treasury by the Commodity Credit Corporation and shall be credited to miscellaneous receipts. In view of the foregoing, it is recommended that the Commodity Credit Corporation be furnished a copy of the appraisal report enclosed herewith and be directed to deposit in the Treasury the amount of $43,756,731.01, as provided by the act approved March 8, 1938.

Faithfully,

H. MORGENTHAU, Jr.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.
[Enclosure.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 27, 1940.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In compliance with your instructions in letter of March 22, 1940, the undersigned committee, on your behalf, has made an appraisal of the assets and liabilities of the Commodity Credit Corporation, for the purpose of determining its net worth as of March 31, 1940, as required by the act approved March 8, 1938 (52 Stat. 107).

There is attached hereto a balance sheet (exhibit A) of the Commodity Credit Corporation, as of March 31, 1940, showing its assets and liabilities on the basis of its book values, together with adjustments to reflect the value of assets, insofar as possible, on the basis of market values as of that date.

As a result of the appraisal of the Corporation's assets, it has been determined that the total assets exceed the total liabilities, including capital stock, to the extent of $43,756,731.01.

ACCOUNTING VERIFICATION

At the request of the committee, the Corporation made arrangements with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to assign its auditors to make a special examination of the books and related records of the Commodity Credit Corporation as of March 31, 1940. A report of this examination has been furnished the committee and indicates that the books, records, and procedures of the Corporation correctly reflect its financial condition.

VALUATION OF COMMODITIES—GENERAL

There is attached hereto a statement of commodity loans as of March 31, 1940 (exhibit B) showing the amounts due the Corporation separated as to principal, accrued interest, estimated accrued warehouse and storage charges, the amounts of the commodities held as security for such loans, the value of such commodities on the basis of market prices as of March 31, 1940, and the estimated loss as of that date on the basis of such values.

An independent verification of all market prices was made by representatives of the Treasury, and the data in the attached statements were checked by the Treasury representatives to the books and records of the Corporation.

In the case of certain commodities no market quotations were available for the particular classes or grades of commodities held by the Corporation. In such instances certification of prices applicable to the commodities involved were obtained from specialists of the Commodity Credit Corporation or the Department of Agriculture familiar with the marketing of these commodities. The bases used in these certifications were carefully analyzed and the prices certified were used for the valuation of the respective commodities.

COTTON

Cotton valuations were based on the weighted average prices, according to grades and staples of cotton, of the 10 designated spot markets as published in the official quotation schedule issued by the Agricultural Marketing Service of the Department of Agriculture for March 30, 1940, reduced where necessary to reflect an average location differential.

The amount of cotton held, the average market prices, and the total market value by crop years are as follows:

Crop year	Bales	Pounds	Average price (per pound)	Total market value
			Cents
1934–35, pool-owned [1]	1,551,854	777,834,159	9.42+	$73,317,796.19
1937–38, pool-owned [1]	5,068,056	2,643,370,680	9.11+	241,022,015.63
1938–39, loans	743,490	381,229,751		[2] 38,622,066.10
1939–40, loans	2,502	1,279,811		[3] 117,112.61
Total	7,365,902	3,803,714,401		353,078,990.53

[1] The cotton "pool-owned" represents cotton taken over from producers through Mar. 31, 1940, under the terms of the loan program, title to which has been acquired by the Corporation.

[2] The market value of this cotton as of Mar. 31, 1940 (381,229,751 pounds at 10.86 cents = $41,401,550.96) is in excess of the amount due the Corporation as of Mar. 31, 1940. Consequently, for the purpose of this report the cotton has been allowed on the basis of the loans thereon by the Corporation which were outstanding as of Mar. 31, 1940.

[3] The market value of this cotton as of Mar. 31, 1940 (1,279,811 pounds at 9.95 cents = $127,341.19) is in excess of the amount due the Corporation as of Mar. 31, 1940. Consequently, for the purpose of this report, the cotton has been allowed on the basis of the loans thereon by the Corporation which were outstanding as of Mar. 31, 1940.

CORN

The value of corn, excepting the pooled corn, was based on the weighted average local market prices (farm prices) in the commercial corn areas, as such corn is stored under seal on the farms of the borrowers.

The pooled corn represents corn taken over from producers through March 31, 1940, title to which has been acquired by the Corporation under the terms of the loan program. This corn has been priced at the market prices per bushel for the respective quantities stored in terminal elevators, subterminal elevators, country elevators, and steel bins of various county agricultural conservation associations.

The amount of corn held, the average market price, and the total value, by crop years, are as follows:

Crop year	Corn held	Average price per bushel	Total market value
	Bushels	Cents
1937–38, loans	509,939	47.9	$244,260.78
1937–38, pool-owned	237,294	[1] 19.79	46,960.48
1938–39, loans	160,825,833	47.9	77,035,574.00
1938–39, pool-owned	90,997,881	48.2+	43,901,506.00
1939–40, loans	8,226,573	47.9	3,940,528.47
Total	260,797,520		125,168,829.73

[1] Valued at the known liquidation price at the time of appraisal. This corn was of substandard grades.

WHEAT

The basis for the valuation of wheat was determined by a comparison of the basic-loan rates on representative grades of wheat under loan with the terminal market prices as of March 31, 1940. This comparison showed that in all cases the terminal market prices were in excess of the basic-loan rates in amounts ample to assure the Corporation against any loss as of March 31, 1940. Consequently, for the purpose of this report, the wheat loans have been allowed on the basis of the amounts due the Corporation on such loans as of March 31, 1940.

The amount of such outstanding loans, plus accrued interest, etc., and quantities held as collateral thereto, by crop years, are as follows:

Crop year	Quantities held	Outstanding loans, plus interest, etc.
	Bushels
1938, wheat	1,282,394	$907,225.08
1939, wheat	7,233,417	5,737,504.98
Total	8,515,811	6,644,730.06

RYE

The value of rye was based on the weighted average market price per bushel at Minneapolis, as furnished by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Department of Agriculture, with allowance for location differential.

As the market value of the rye (1,181,190 pounds at 51.8 cents equals $611,856.42) is in excess of the amount due the Corporation as of March 31, 1940, the rye loans have been allowed on the basis of the amounts due the Corporation on such loans as of that date.

The amount of outstanding loans plus accrued interest, etc., and quantities held as collateral thereto, by crop years, are as follows:

Crop year	Quantities held	Outstanding loans, plus interest, etc.

TOBACCO

The value of tobacco was based on information furnished by the Director, General Crops Division of the Commodity Credit Corporation, and were arrived at after giving careful consideration to the inventories, age, current market conditions, and trade trends.

The amount of tobacco held, the average prices as recommended by the Director, and the total market value are as follows:

Crop year	Quantities held	Average price	Total market value
	Pounds	Cents
1933–37, loans	15,234,986	5.2+	$803,677.10
1938, Wisconsin	278,846	3.5	9,759.61
1939, purchased	177,082,035		[1] 36,827,720.99
Total	192,595,867		37,641,157.70

[1] This tobacco is owned by the Corporation and was purchased for its account by certain exporting firms from funds advanced by the Corporation. The exporting firms have options to purchase the tobacco from the Corporation at cost including charges. The Director also estimated that the tobacco could fairly be valued at the amount paid thereon by the Corporation as of Mar. 31, 1940, as it is estimated that such amount was less than market prices for the respective grades held as of that date.

TURPENTINE AND ROSIN

The value of turpentine and gum rosin was based on the Savannah naval stores' quotations for March 30, 1940.

The amount of turpentine and gum rosin, the price of turpentine in bulk and rosin in barrels, and the total market values are as follows:

Production year	Turpentine and rosin held	Market price	Total market price
1938, turpentine	None
	106 empty barrels	$2.00	$212.00
1938, rosin	538,424 barrels [1]	$10.12+	5,348,177.78
1939, turpentine	4,482,419 gallons	25.75 cents	1,154,222.89
1939, rosin	601,638 barrels [1]	$9.94+	5,982,119.73
Total			12,484,732.40

[1] On basis of 500 pounds per barrel.

PEANUTS, FIGS, AND PECANS

The value of peanuts, figs, and pecans was based on the amounts loaned on these commodities, plus accrued interest and expenses, if any, as such loans were made in cooperation with the Secretary of Agriculture in order to remove these commodities from the edible trade for the purpose of stabilizing trade prices. These commodities are disposed of from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, by being diverted, as much as possible, to other than the edible trade. Under agreement between the Secretary of Agriculture, the Commodity Credit Corporation and the borrowers, the Corporation is secured against any loss in these transactions. Therefore, for the purpose of this report, these commodity loans have been allowed on the basis of the amounts due the Corporation on such loans as of March 31, 1940.

The amount of such outstanding loans, plus accrued interest, etc., and quantities held as collateral thereto, are as follows:

Commodity	Quantities held	Outstanding loans, plus interest, etc.
	Pounds
1939–40, peanuts	14,440,015	$448,894.45
1939–40, figs	3,100,850	44,055.93
1938–39, pecans	2,005,174	305,514.59
Total	19,546,039	798,464.97

HOPS

These loans were made under marketing agreements with the borrowers. The market value of hops was based on information furnished by the Director, General Crops Division of the Commodity Credit Corporation and was arrived at after giving careful consideration to the inventories, domestic and foreign markets, the age of the hops, and lack of demand for hops of the particular class held by the Corporation.

The amount of hops held by crop years, the average price as recommended by the Director, and the total market price are as follows:

Crop year	Quantities held	Average price	Total market value
	Pounds	Cents
1938-39, hops	4,975,753	10	$497,575.30

RAISINS, WOOL, AND BUTTER

Loans on the above commodities were made under marketing agreements with the borrowers. The market values on such commodities as of March 31, 1940, are, in each instance, in excess of the amount due the Corporation as of that date. Therefore, for the purpose of this report, these commodity loans have been allowed on the basis of the amounts due the Corporation on such loans as of March 31, 1940.

The amount of such outstanding loans, plus accrued interest, etc., quantities held as collateral thereto, by commodities, are as follows:

Commodity	Quantities held	Outstanding loans, plus interest, etc.
1938-39, raisins	51,352.8 tons	$1,196,011.45
1939, wool	86,729 pounds	15,225.95
1939, butter	716,974 pounds	194,589.09

LOANS HELD BY LENDING AGENCIES

As of March 31, 1940, various lending agencies had made loans on commodities under the terms of Commodity Credit Corporation contracts to purchase such loans from the lending agencies under certain specified conditions. The amount of outstanding loans, the accrued interest and estimated warehouse and storage charges on the underlying collateral held by lending agencies as reported to the Corporation as of March 31, 1940, and which it is committed to purchase under its contracts, are as follows:

Commodity	Face amount of loans, interest, and warehouse charges	Market value of security [1]	Estimated loss
1938-39, cotton	$98,128,879.22	$98,128,879.22	None
1939-40, cotton	907,189.72	907,189.72	None
1939-40, corn	146,466,926.38	122,789,722.03	$23,677,204.35
1939, wheat	78,661,904.98	78,661,904.98	None
1939, wool	184,942.67	184,942.67	None
Total	324,349,842.97	300,672,638.62	23,677,204.35

[1] In valuing the above cotton, corn, wheat, and wool, the same prices were applied as those used in valuing these same commodities by crop years as appear in the forepart of this report.

Based on the market values of the commodities, listed in the foregoing table, on which loans had been made by lending agencies and reported to the Commodity Credit Corporation as at March 31, 1940, an estimated loss of $23,677,204.35 will be sustained in view of the Corporation's commitments to purchase such loans from the lending agencies under certain specified conditions. The details of this estimated loss are set forth in exhibit C.

COMMITMENTS TO MAKE LOANS

As of March 31, 1940, various tobacco associations had made loans to producers on the 1939 crop tobacco under the terms of Commodity Credit Corporation commitments wherein the Corporation agreed to take over such loans from the associations. Through March 31, 1940, the associations had availed themselves of commitments with the Corporation, the particulars of which are as follows:

Commitments	Amount of loans by associations	Market value of security	Estimated loss to Commodity Credit Corporation
No. 1—1939, tobacco	$37,077.00	$17,867.23	$19,209.77
No. 2—1939, tobacco	60,450.00	28,190.26	32,259.74
No. 3—1939, tobacco	381,610.00	307,750.00	73,860.00
No. 4—1939, tobacco	176,131.80	176,131.80	None
No. 5—1939, tobacco	88,400.00	88,400.00	None
Total	743,668.80	618,339.29	125,329.51

Based on the market value of the tobacco held by the associations under these commitments, an estimated loss of $125,329.51 will be sustained. The details of such estimated loss are set forth in Exhibit C.

BASIS OF APPRAISAL

The Corporation's assets secured by the various commodities were valued strictly on the basis of the market prices which were available on such commodities as of March 31, 1940, adjusted, where necessary, to give effect to grade differences and freight differentials between the actual location of the commodities and the terminal markets. The Corporation's liabilities were adjusted where necesary to reflect the true liability for the purpose of appraisal.

The committee is of the opinion that the prices used in the valuation of the various commodities accurately reflect the market prices of such commodities as of March 31, 1940, as contemplated under the act of March 8, 1938, and that the necessary consideration has been given to all related factors, such as accrued interest and other charges, in arriving at the stated excess of $43,756,731.01 of assets over liabilities as at March 31, 1940.

EXCESS OF NET WORTH FOR DEPOSIT IN THE TREASURY AS MISCELLANEOUS RECEIPTS

On the basis of this appraisal it has been determined that the net worth of the Commodity Credit Corporation is $43,756,731.01 in excess of $100,000,000. A reconciliation of net worth is as follows:

Pick-up Routes in 7 States Will Bring Air Mail Service to 139 Communities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, it is worthy of comment, at this time, that we are to see the greatest expansion in the domestic air-transportation system which has taken place thus far in the history of the United States. I refer to the service which will soon be started through the use of the pick-up and delivery device on five routes which have been approved by the Civil Aeronautics Board by the issuing of a certificate of convenience and necessity to All American Aviation, Inc.

SEVEN STATES ARE SERVED

These routes include 7 States. There are 78 new points that they will cover which is exclusive of 8 cities that now have air service. There are 53 additional nearby communities which will be served from these stations, making a total of 139 that will receive the advantages of direct service through the unique service by which air mail and air express are collected by airplanes in flight.

Counting terminal points this total includes 83 cities and towns in Pennsylvania, 54 of which will be station points; 37 in West Virginia, 25 of which will be station points; 15 in Ohio, 8 of which will be station points; 4 in Delaware with 1 station point; 2 in Kentucky, both station points; 2 in New York with 1 station point; and 1 substation point in New Jersey. Many of the terminal points population of the communities ranges from 799 to 115,000. Glenville, W. Va., is the smallest and Wilmington, Del., is the largest.

After 22 years of development present air transportation includes 189 cities, most of which have a population well over 100,000. The pick-up system brings advantages of air mail to smaller cities, which are nevertheless important trading centers.

EFFICIENT SERVICE GIVEN

I believe this new development marks the first practical effort by the Civil Aeronautics Board to extend benefits of air transportation directly to small communities through the establishment of feeder lines, although both the Government and the aviation industry have been studying this problem for some time. The successful experimental service of this type was proof of the real need. This service has a primary purpose of the air pick-up system by which it is possible to render fast and efficient service to any town regardless of size, location, or landing facilities. Thirty-nine towns on the five routes awarded have no airports. The Board's decision indicated that if the system attracts a substantial patronage "further extension on an increasing scale may be expected to be justified."

In opposing the application of All American, Eastern Air Lines and T. W. A. had felt that existing air lines were entitled to preference in the development of feeder routes. The Board rejected this argument as untenable. In its decision we find the following:

It is the insistence of T. W. A. and Eastern that the existing air transportation system should be given the opportunity to participate in the development of feeder routes, and should not be preceded into this field by new companies. Such an asserting of a preemptive right ignores the fact that applicant is a pioneer in a type of service which the established carriers have made no attempt to develop and which is necessarily distinct from through service. Airplanes engaged in long distance through operations cannot, without destroying the value of that operation, make frequent landings, nor even such frequent descents to low altitudes without landing as a pick-up operation requires.

Moreover, the application of the principle suggested by the interveners would be clearly inconsistent with the mandate contained in section 2 (d) of the Civil Aeronautics Act which directs the Board to consider as being in the public interest and in accordance with the public convenience and necessity "competition to the extent necessary to assure the sound development of an air-transportation system properly adapted to the needs of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, of the Postal Service, and of the national defense." Any such theory as advocated by the interveners, which would result in reserving solely for existing air lines the privilege of providing all additions to the present air-transportation system of the United States, is untenable. Our adoption of such a policy would certainly not be consistent with a sound development of air transportation, and would not be conducive to the best interests of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, the Postal Service, and the national defense.

Transportation of mail and express only is authorized in the certificate recently issued. The company had applied for a route between Pittsburgh and Cleveland on which passenger carrying was proposed. The plan was to extend similar service to the other routes if it proved successful. This section of the application was denied by the Board because the projected service was largely experimental. It was stated, however, that its finding is without prejudice, and that it would entertain a renewal of the application at such a time as the company is prepared to present a more completely developed proposal. I feel in time a combination service will be recognized as practical.

The air pick-up system which will be used on the new routes is practical, as demonstrated in a year's operation conducted by All American, under the supervision of the Post Office Department, on two experimental routes which was concluded on May 15. These 2 routes covered 62 communities, 58 of which have been included on the new lines.

FINE PERFORMANCE RECORD

During this experiment of 1 year, planes operated 438,145 scheduled miles and made over 23,000 pick-ups without a casualty, for a performance record of 91.6 percent. Reporting to Congress on the results, the Postmaster General said that the safety record was "perhaps without precedent" for a pioneer service, and that the performance record had exceeded all expectations. The system, he stated, had proved both feasible and practical. He recommended the permanent establishment of air pick-up routes under the Civil Aeronautics Board. It was my pleasure to have called attention on the floor of the House of Representatives, many times, to the success of the operations. I shall always be happy that I labored, in the face of discouragements, to bring about passage of legislation which made possible this service.

Richard C. du Pont, president of All American, has declared the company is prepared to start service over the new routes just as soon as arrangements can be cleared with the Post Office Department. The company, he states, has held its organization practically intact since suspension of service on the experimental routes in May. It is believed ready to begin operations again on a very short notice.

Rejection by the Civil Aeronautics Board of the application to carry passengers, Du Pont stated, will not affect the company's developmental work in this direction. He repeated that he was convinced that passenger service can be conducted efficiently in connection with pick-up operations, and that the company intended to acquire a twin-engined passenger plane in the near future with which experiments along this line will be conducted. He said:

> The decision of the C. A. B. did not close the door on this idea. It simply asked us to come back when we are prepared to present a more completely developed proposal. I think that we will be able to do that as the result of the experiments we are now planning. Developmental work is an important part of our activities. We have been working to improve the pick-up system almost since the day the company was organized, and we have developed an improved and simplified system capable of handling much heavier loads. This system has performed according to expectations in numerous tests and we hope to announce soon that it is ready to be placed in regular operation.

It is my strong feeling, Mr. Speaker, that the further use of the pick-up system will continue to give the United States the leadership in this field. We shall, I feel certain, continue to give support and encouragement to the program so successfully begun.

Jews Drill Here for an Alaskan Defense Colony

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

ARTICLE FROM NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune, Sunday, July 21, 1940. This article is in relation to a subject on which I have already spoken, that of a Jewish army organized to fight somewhere in the United States.

I want those who read this to bear in mind that Mr. Hefter is not a veteran of the Imperial German Army, the Imperial Russian Army, the Imperial Austrian and Hungarian Armies. He fought instead under the red revolutionary banner of Lenin, Trotsky, and Bela Kuhn, the revolutionaries who were financed by the international financiers in Wall Street, to bring about the overthrow of the Imperial Russian Government, that finally terminated in the murder of the royal Russian family, including the intelligentsia and the industrialists of the same country. As a matter of fact, this communistic revolution is an example of what the Communist will do in those countries in which they obtain control, and should be a warning to us. These revolutionary armies murdered in cold blood over 30,000 Christians in Hungary, and did not spare unprotected and unarmed men, women, and children. They did not spare churches and other sacred institutions, but destroyed them as they have done in Russia. These same revolutionaries killed over 70,000 white Christian Russians on the Crimean Peninsula, and are largely responsible for the death of over 10,000,000 innocent people since the communistic regime began in Russia over 20 years ago. It is this disciple of revolution who is now training the so-called Jewish army, advertised and pictured in a Washington paper and in the Herald Tribune on July 21, 1940.

The point for us to bear in mind is that this Russian revolutionary, Mr. Hefter, intends to operate his army in Alaska, and let us not forget that our Alaska island of Little Diomede, is only 1 mile apart from the Russian Island of the same name. Let us also bear in mind that the Russian Government is a Jewish revolutionary government, as it was when organized by Lenin and Trotsky.

If this movement is allowed to go on, can we be assured that this army of 100,000, fully equipped for field service, will not join with the Russian revolutionaries to bring about an invasion of the United States by the way of Alaska? Isn't it possible that if this army is allowed to operate free from Government control, it will become extremely dangerous to the safety and security of the United States. Why should we tolerate such organization when the nonsectarian anti-Nazi league raised such a rumpus over 21 members of the Christian Front who had in their possession 17 or 18 obsolete .22 caliber rifles, which were used for target practice? Surely, we have many rifle teams throughout the United States with much more modern equipment, the members of which derive much pleasure in target practice and competition with other similar organizations. Here, however, in Mr. Hefter's army, we are confronted with a military organization under the leadership of a revolutionary, operating free from military supervision or Federal control. This army—if the paper is correct—is intended to operate in Alaska, a country through which the Communists of Russia may invade Canada and the United States, across a little body of water that separates Alaska from the Russian continent.

It occurs to me that these people, if they want to fight, should join the American Army or take themselves across to Russia to fight for a principle in which they seem to believe, but which is foreign to the United States. However, the fact still remains that no private organization or private group has any constitutional right to organize themselves into an army in this country, to operate for any purpose except that prescribed by our own military laws. It is now up to Congress to investigate and institute proceedings to stop this organization.

Let it be understood that when I speak of the international revolutionary Jew, or anyone else engaged in the same subversive activities, I do not include those Jewish citizens who believe in the fundamental principles of this Republic, as set forth in the Constitution of the United States, for they are, of course, loyal Americans, like everyone else who believes in these principles, and are so considered by me in all my discussions.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of July 21, 1940]

JEWS DRILL HERE FOR AN ALASKAN DEFENSE COLONY—VETERAN OF FOUR ARMIES WILL PUT "ARMY" IN FIELD TO PROTECT UNITED STATES TERRITORY

Defense and colonization of the sparsely settled parts of Alaska by a group of young American Jews may soon become a reality, it was disclosed yesterday by Otmar Hefter, writer, retired clothing designer, and veteran of four armies. Mr. Hefter, member of the board of the Great West Colonization, which is seeking to settle Jews in Alaska, is now enlisting "tough young Jews" for an American-Jewish border regiment. He reports that nearly 800 recruits are already receiving training in group settlement and guerrilla warfare.

The Alaskan program is an outgrowth of the Nai Juda movement, which sought to erect an independent Jewish state in South America, and has the approval of the War Department and of the Department of the Interior, Mr. Hefter said. With several of his associates, he appeared in Washington recently before the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and he asserted that Senator WILLIAM D. KING, Democrat, of Utah, who presided at the hearing, commended the plan.

When the present world situation forced the abandonment of the project for colonizing Jews on a tract of land in South America, its sponsors turned to Alaska. At first it was believed that civilian training would be sufficient for the colonists, but as the defense problem became more acute, it was decided to create an "emergency auxiliary fighting force" which either could be fused with the colonists or could operate as a separate body, Mr. Hefter said.

"We have proved to the Government that we not only can aid in exploiting the rich resources of Alaska, but that we can contribute to its defense," he said. "We have virtually the only organization in America that is fully prepared for large-scale colonization. After discussing the plan with Government officials, we undertook to train small contingents for the work. Now the groundwork has been laid to enable us to take care of large groups, and it will be possible to send them to Alaska in a few months."

It is planned to settle the new frontiersmen on the Kenai Peninsula, near Seward, and the chamber of commerce of that town has placed itself on record as backing such an undertaking four-square. Mr. Hefter said that the legal and economic problems connected with the undertaking had been ironed out after lengthy negotiations with the Department of the Interior. It has been suggested, he added, that the settlers might tackle the construction of a road extension north or west of Seward as part of their development program.

The men of the border regiment will become the plainsmen of the twentieth century, according to Mr. Hefter, and each settlement will be quasi military, so that the defense corps can be mobilized at bases whenever necessary. The colonists themselves will be trained in the use of arms so that in the event of an armed invasion they would augment the forces of the border regiment.

Mr. Hefter has designed a uniform of camouflage cloth for the regiment, fully adaptable to rigorous outdoor life. It was decided to instruct the men in the practices of guerrilla warfare, since that method of fighting should give the defenders a decided advantage over an enemy in Alaska. The tactics of the Chinese armies in harassing Japanese troop movements and cutting communications have been carefully studied and are being taught to the volunteers.

Squads of 25 men each have been drilling regularly in the rather cramped quarters of Mr. Hefter's headquarters at 112 West Forty-sixth Street. As soon as the men have mastered the rudiments of handling arms they will be taken to two training bases at Oxford, Conn., and Livingston Manor, N. Y., where Mr. Hefter said he would give them 6 weeks of training. In that time, he promised, "I'll break their backs or make men of them."

The men forming the border regiment will receive maintenance, but no salary, Mr. Hefter said, and they will be kept outdoors all the time, with one blanket apiece. The volunteers are between the ages of 18 and 25. All must be robust, and according to the recruit's enlistment form each pledges "as an American, a Jew, and a man to guard the borders of our country, to fight to the finish for its freedom, and not to lay down my arms as long as liberty and the rights of man are threatened."

Should there be national conscription of men from 21 to 25, Mr. Hefter said he would turn over to the Government at least partially trained troops, and the younger men of the border regiment would continue their work until such time as they were called up.

Young women may join the colonization group and the wives of some of the recruits have already done so. They are subjected to the same strenuous training which the prospective colonists undergo. Mr. Hefter said that women were encouraged to join so that communal life might be established in the new settlements.

Mr. Hefter served in the Austrian Army from 1914 to 1918 and won four medals for gallantry in action. He joined the Hungarian National Army in 1918 and served with the Czechoslovakian Army in 1920, after which he joined the French Foreign Legion. He came to the United States in 1925 and became a citizen 10 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, it is very generous of Mr. Hefter to turn over partially trained men to the United States Army, but is it not strange that a private citizen should be allowed to train troops for the United States.

I wonder why this army puts particular stress on young women, who are invited to join, and in the same breath states that they are subject to the same strenuous training as prescribed for those who are to colonize Alaska. There is, however, one sentence in this paragraph to which I wish to call particular attention, which reads: "Mr. Hefter said that women were encouraged to join so that communal life may be established." I want you to note the word "communal," because the women of Russia were communized or regimented into national service. We hold our women in the highest esteem and we do not want any American young women organized into communal service for a revolutionary army; for that is the Russian not the American way of treating women.

Dr. Francis Townsend's Great Service to America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to pay some deserved tribute to a former South Dakotan who, for the past several years has probably been more in the public eye than any other citizen of this country, with the possible exception of the President himself. I refer to Dr. Francis E. Townsend, president and organizer of the Townsend National Recovery Plan.

A few moments of serious reflection must convince any sincere citizen that Dr. Townsend's service to America has had a remarkable impact upon our national life, and the thousands of local clubs and State organizations which have joined with him continue their activities with a persistence which can only be the result of a sincere devotion to the ideals which they expound. It is not necessary that a citizen belong to one of these clubs or even that he support the program of universal pensions which they espouse in order to recognize the great public service which Dr. Townsend has rendered to America, and which he continues to provide on a variety of fronts as the years come and go. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that somebody in this House should stand up and give due credit to Dr. Townsend, the man, for his determined courage and unyielding patriotism in fighting for a better and safer America, on a variety of fronts.

Undaunted by ridicule or persecution, Dr. Townsend has fought consistently and persistently for a program of pay-as-you-go pensions which avoid the necessity of taking a pauper's oath as a prerequisite to eligibility, and as his organization has increased in size and maturity he has lent its influence in support of other worth-while objectives looking to the building of a better and safer America.

ONE NEW DEAL PURGE THAT FAILED

At the outset of this campaign to make Americans pension conscious, Dr. Townsend was subjected to the sharpest ridicule of the most poignant pens but he and his followers refused to be "laughed out of court." When a congressional committee packed with antagonistic new dealers turned an orderly investigation into a cruel inquisition, Dr. Townsend was cited for a highly justified contempt which he registered for the committee and was sentenced to a Federal court. He asked no quarter from his persecutors and refused to fight this infamous miscarriage of justice. When he came to Washington to serve his sentence, pressure on President Roosevelt became so great that he could no longer ignore it so the President finally yielded and partially undid the injustice of his political and party associates by pardoning Dr. Townsend in spite of his willingness to accept the star-chamber action of his attackers. Even the most ardent foes of Dr. Townsend's program resented the treatment accorded him by these high-handed disciples of the New Deal who tried to railroad him out of public esteem by consigning him to a jail cell. Like most attempts to use force unjustly and with arrogance, the attempt failed and Dr. Townsend emerged from his rift with the New Deal palace brigade stronger than before his persecution.

DR. TOWNSEND HAS MADE AMERICA PENSION MINDED

When the final book of history is written, honest recorders will have to give much of the credit to Dr. Townsend for the mighty strides which America has taken toward a program of honest and universal pensions. No other man and no other agency have done as much to quicken the consciousness of this country to the needs of its elderly citizens as Dr. Townsend and the national-recovery plan with which he has pioneered.

Many observers believe that the inauguration of our present Social Security Act, inadequate and inequitable as it is, came as an effort to sidetrack Dr. Townsend; and practically all observers agree that we would now have no such law on our statue books were it not for the spadework done by the Townsend people of America. If the Social Security Act does nothing else—and it does very little else for the farmers, small-business men, and individual workers of America—it is a recognition of the fact that this country does have an obligation to the aged, the unemployed, and the unfortunate in its midst; and for drilling that fact into the consciousness of America, much of the credit must go to Dr. Townsend.

Definite planks in the platforms of both of our major national parties pay further tribute to Dr. Townsend by recognizing the fundamental truth of his philosophy through the inclusion of planks calling for pay-as-you-go pensions for America's elder citizens on an increasingly generous and inclusive basis. It cannot be denied that had not Dr. Townsend years ago begun his efforts to make America pension-minded, meaningless white spaces would undoubtedly represent the places in these party platforms which are now filled by pledges to go further and further toward the goal defined by Dr. Townsend and his associates.

DR. TOWNSEND'S PUBLIC SERVICE NOT LIMITED TO PENSIONS

Of late years, it is gratifying to notice the increasing scope of Dr. Townsend's sphere of influence and service in this country. He and his organization were among the first to become articulate in the demand that America avoid involvement in war overseas. They were insistent in their demands that we perfect and modernize our national-defense establishment, but they were equally insistent that American boys must not again be sent overseas to die in wars on foreign battlefields. The influence of an organization as large and as representative as Dr. Townsend's cannot be minimized whenever it throws its support behind a national issue of great public concern. Even his erstwhile persecutors and those who would have thrown him in jail cannot accuse him of selfish or ulterior motives or insinuate that he seeks personal profit by taking a public stand on the vital issues of peace and preparedness.

Within the month, Dr. Townsend has again demonstrated in a two-fold manner that his influence for the betterment of human society in this country is not limited to his efforts to attain the fundamental pension goal established by his organization. On July 16, Dr. Townsend sent telegrams to the Governors of each of the respective States of the Union urging them to enact anti "fifth column" legislation, and pledging the full support of his organization and all its individual chapters to combating subversive un-American activities in this country. By this move he has again evidenced his capacity for public service to America. America must rid itself of the hazards resulting from Nazi bunds, Communist camps, and Fascist fronts if we are to remain safe and strong, and Dr. Townsend's support of this pro-American campaign is both timely and effective. He is entitled to the congratulations of all patriotic Americans for his activity in this connection.

DR. TOWNSEND OPPOSES ATTEMPT TO VIOLATE THIRD-TERM TRADITION

Finally, Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, Dr. Townsend—whose political affiliation is unknown to me as it is to most of you, since he has consistently refused to make his organization political, except as it is necessary to do so to support its friends, to resist its oppressors, and to defeat policies and programs it considers harmful to America—has made a statement showing the dangers of a third term which should be read by every American. Not only did the fifth annual national Townsend convention adopt a strong resolution condemning a third term for any President, at its convention in St. Louis, but Dr. Townsend has displayed traditional courage and forthrightness by making a recent statement amplifying the reasons why he and his organization fear the un-American and nation-wrecking consequences of a third term.

Because of its candor and logic and because it so closely parallels the position of other outstanding Americans who are voicing their opinion of the third term at this critical stage in our national history, I am concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by inserting in the RECORD a substantial portion of Dr. Townsend's criticism of President Roosevelt's unprecedented attempt to secure for himself a third consecutive term as President of the United States. This statement was taken from the Townsend National Weekly for Saturday, July 27, 1940.

"NO THIRD TERM," SAYS DR. TOWNSEND

(By Dr. F. E. Townsend)

I have been asked to state my views to the press on the matter of a third term for President Roosevelt.

If I had had any views to the contrary, the practically unanimous vote against a third term for any president, given by the 10,000 delegates to the Townsend Convention in St. Louis 2 weeks ago would have compelled me to change my mind.

I am against the third term in principle. The proposal to elect a man for a third term is an intimation that we are running short of men with capabilities for filling the position of President. This I shall never admit. I believe there are better men now living who are qualified as Presidential timber and more of them than ever before existed. I admit that it is hard to secure their services for this important job but when the need is greatest the man always appears.

INVITES CORRUPTION

I am against the third term because it invites political corruption and makes it possible for political gangs to perpetuate themselves in office and to spread their corruption in ever widening circles of the population. A recent statement appearing in the press and attributed to Bert Stand of Tammany is as follows: "The third term is taken care of. Roosevelt's got to run. We're for him all the way and we're for him for a fourth term, too."

I am against Mr. Roosevelt's nomination for a third term by the Democratic Party because during his administration the low income groups of the Nation have been imposed upon and compelled to contribute of their meager incomes to support a "social-security" program that is a fraudulent and tragic failure. It purports to tax them for their own protection but the protection actually afforded them will not keep starvation from their doors.

CITES PERSECUTION

Certainly a President should know at all times what his Congress is doing. During Mr. Roosevelt's administration a "congressional investigation" of the Townsend old-age revolving pensions plan was inaugurated that for political viciousness and scandalous disregard of congressional honor and decency has never before been equaled.

I am against a continuation of the New Deal under Mr. Roosevelt because during his term of office the taxpayers' money has been used to influence elections through W. P. A. and other job-dispensing agencies.

I am against a continuation of Mr. Roosevelt's regime because it has brought upon the country a ruinous burden of debt and has made of the Congress of the United States a subservient "must Congress" to its lasting shame and disgrace.

POINTS TO ACTS

I am against him as President any longer because of his willingness to break with precedent and proceed toward his own desired ends, through such acts as his attempt to pack the Supreme Court and to "purge" his political enemies.

The Democratic Convention made a tragic mistake, in my opinion, when it nominated Mr. Roosevelt for a third term.

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, a humble and great character came into the Union Station this morning after one of the most eventful episodes in the diplomatic history of our Nation. That man was the Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull. What he did at Habana, in the way that has characterized his greatness since his public career began, need not be heralded now by my mere words. History will speak in a permanent way, but what he said as he responded to the felicitous greetings of the gentleman from Alabama, Speaker WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, must be of interest.

"I accept your greetings with all the sincerity my nature allows," he answered, and the gentleman from New Jersey, Representative CHARLES EATON promptly added, "That is some sincerity." That sincerity, that honesty, that character, all have been of the greatest influence in our good-neighbor policy. If we are winning back our friends south of the Rio Grande, the accomplishment is in no small way due to the man who directs our diplomatic department. He certainly fulfills the Biblical statement, "Seekest thou a man diligent in his business, he shall stand before kings. He shall not stand before mean men."

A Phony Draft

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. JONES
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL BY C. FRANK RIDENOUR

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks, I insert this editorial written by C. Frank Ridenour, owner and editor of the Piqua Daily Call, Piqua, Ohio:

A PHONY DRAFT

The third-term unwritten law, which has not been violated during the entire life of this Republic, was broken early this morning, for the first time, when the Democratic Convention, acting under the spur and whip of President Roosevelt and his clique of White House draft schemers, renominated the President for a third term. The action of this convention, responding to sealed orders, represents a new low in political conventions and reveals President Roosevelt in his true colors. In a large measure this ridiculous and hypocritical convention, as manipulated by the President, justifies the widespread claim of political adversaries that the President seeks power for power's sake. Millions of people, who honestly admired President Roosevelt and honestly believed that he was destined to go down in history as one of the country's greatest leaders, will be saddened by this revelation. Because they admired and believed in him, in spite of the growing distrust of some of his policies, they are sorry to discover another idol with feet of clay.

The renomination of President Roosevelt was not in fact a draft by the people, as the leaders of the draft movement so desperately tried to make it appear, but was purely "phony" in character, as is now revealed for all to see.

By his silence, right down to the eve of his nomination, President Roosevelt made it impossible for other candidates for the nomination to attract the attention of the party. It is now apparent he "planned it that way." The fact that he had Harry Hopkins, his personal representative, in Chicago and had a direct wire from the White House to the Hopkins headquarters is proof that he was running the convention by remote control. And then for the President to send a message to the convention, and indirectly to the public, disclaiming his desire or purpose of being a candidate, was little short of an insult to the intelligence of the delegates and the public.

It was not a sincere statement. The facts did not bear it out. It was made in an effort to make the "draft" look plausible to the Nation. In that it surely failed. It only served to show the Chief Executive in the worst position he has occupied during his long public career.

It is little short of a tragedy that a man, who was destined for a high place in history, should by his own action cheat himself out of that place in the recorded history of our time.

In spite of their forced demonstrations of joy it seems apparent that the delegates to the convention were not happy. It is also apparent that millions of Democrats are not happy over the outcome of their convention, and it is probable they will join the Republicans in November to elect Wendell L. Willkie and thereby give notice that the people do not think any man is indispensable to the country.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1940

STATEMENT BY RT. REV. MSGR. MICHAEL J. READY

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, no better and more cogent expression of the religious attitude on peacetime conscription has been given than that expressed by the Reverend Monsignor Michael J. Ready, general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference before the Military Committee yesterday. He bespoke a studied and calm reexamination of the whole question. This Congress will guarantee that study, I am confident. I insert his statement here:

SELECTIVE TRAINING AND SERVICE ACT OF 1940

I appear before this committee by direction of the archbishops and bishops of the administrative board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. The administrative board, consisting of 16 archbishops and bishops is elected annually by the general meeting of the bishops of the United States, to serve the national interests of the church, and in this particular and present action, it is obeying a resolution of the general meeting adopted November 16, 1939, in its session at the Catholic University, Washington.

I have the honor to present to this Military Affairs Committee of the House a statement of general attitude toward the bill under consideration, written by the board of bishops at a meeting in Chicago, July 4, 1940:

"The Catholic Church is committed by its very nature to the promulgation of the gospel of peace and to the elimination from human society of the causes of war. The ideal of the church is the 'peace of Christ in the Kingdom of Christ.' Again and again in these latter days the present Supreme Pontiff has reminded the world of this ideal and, even as his predecessors before him, has striven with all the means at his disposal to preserve the world from the horrors of armed conflict. For this he has won the admiration of religious men and women of all creeds. Inspired by his leadership, Catholics in our own country have endeavored to promote international peace and have worked and prayed, and continue to work and pray, that God may avert from this favored land the disasters of war.

"It seems that tragic circumstances of the present hour are demanding that we invoke the law of self-protection for our national security. Regretfully, Christians are obliged to realize that adequate national defense demands the training of large numbers of our citizens in the arts of warfare. It is imperative that the extent of the emergency and the consequent need for action should be generally realized. On the other hand, in the interests of sound procedure, it should not be overstated. Because of the character of the times, any program promoted by any group, be it militarist, isolationist, or interventionist, should be subjected to critical appraisal and cool, sound judgment.

"The American way of life has developed certain definite democratic ideals. No emergency should be allowed to destroy the values that are of the very essence of liberty as we know it in America. Consequently, no plan for the national defense should do unnecessary violence to the religious and educational traditions upon which our democracy is founded and apart from which it will not continue to flourish."

Because of the serious damage this bill would cause to the religious, educational, and charitable institutions of the church, and consequently to our whole civil society, the bishops are opposed to provisions in this bill which include for compulsory military service students for the priesthood and brothers under vow to serve the works of religion.

H. R. 10132 is a bill which proposes "to protect the integrity and institutions of the United States through a system of selective compulsory military training and service."

The bill declares that "the integrity and institutions of the United States are gravely threatened and that to insure the independence and freedom of the people of the United States it is imperative that immediate measures be taken to mobilize the Nation's strength."

Specifically, the bill proposes to mobilize the Nation's manpower so that "every able-bodied man shall fit into his proper place under a fair system of selective compulsory military training and service."

The bill does not define or state what are the dangers which gravely threaten the integrity and institutions of our country in a manner that calls for the mobilization of all the men of the Nation.

That the integrity and the institutions of the United States face possible dangers today because of a war ravaging most of Europe is apparent. That these dangers justify national preparedness for defense on the scale contemplated in the bill under consideration is not supported by any evidence.

The bill seems to propose compulsory military service as a permanent national policy "whether a state of war exists or not" (sec. 4).

The bill does not contemplate an emergency which might justify total mobilization. It would provide a long-range defense program as a national policy.

Dangers to national integrity and institutions are not all external; many are internal, relating to national unity, to respect for national institutions, to morale, to those virtues civic and moral which are fountains of strength and courage enabling men to sacrifice when sacrifice is required. No national-defense policy would be adequate that neglected the agencies by which these virtues are fostered and promoted.

Chief among these agencies are the churches with their charitable and educational as well as their distinctly religious activities.

We believe that the interests of our country would have been served better if this proposed legislation had originated in Congress.

Certainly, Congress would have supported, not to say protected, the basic interests of religion.

There is at present a high-pressure propaganda for this bill emanating from the military professionals. This propaganda is designed to convince the American people that war is inevitable and that the time to prepare for that war is very short. If the measure of defense contemplated in this conscription bill is forecast accurately, then those who will be called to give their lives for the defense of our country should know the facts.

Military conscription is a matter of supreme importance to our present citizens and to future generations. This legislation is too important to be rushed through Congress until all other possible programs have been examined. The military professionals would convince us that necessary forces of men cannot be obtained by voluntary service. The newspapers tell us that a thousand men a day are enlisting in various branches of the service. It is certain that a proper, reasonable, Nation-wide appeal to the men of our country would be answered by volunteers in numbers greater than present resources to care for them. If the study and propaganda expended on this conscription bill had been applied to methods for getting voluntary enlistments, the Nation would have been better served. The possibility of a 1 year voluntary enlistment program should be exhausted before resorting to a compulsory one. We are, after all, living at peace with the world and our determination should lead us to the preservation of such peace.

Every loyal American is in favor of a defense program which will make us so strong that no other nation or coalition of nations dare to attack us. In preparing such a defense, we should rely on the fine traditions which have made and kept this Nation great.

We believe that Congress understands better than military professionals the services to our American society which religion has established, supported, and administered. These services are given to the Nation not only in specific churches and houses of worship but also in universities, colleges, secondary schools, hospitals, houses of protection and correction for youth, and in a wide variety of special agencies for mercy and charity. These institutions are staffed and directed by a personnel consecrated to the ministry of religion. Young men willingly enter our seminaries and novitiates in answer to a call of conscience. They volunteer to dedicate their lives to the service of Christ and the service of their neighbor for the love of and in imitation of Christ.

They may expect no earthly remuneration in this ministry, except a frugal, humble subsistence. We do not believe that the Congress of the United States will knowingly destroy or interfere with such heroic religious practice. We hold that much of the world's present distress is due to the spirit of stark materialism which has seized the minds and wills of men and nations. This Republic has been enriched by the Christian social services fostered by the Church and administered from the motive of Christian charity and benevolence. We believe that the Congress will insure continued protection to that consecrated service for God and humanity.

The present bill departs from that national tradition of respect for and protection of religious institutions. The military mind which drafted the bill now under consideration had an intense fear of the word exemption. No service to the Nation, even in peacetime, according to this bill, is comparable to the lowest form of military training. All modes of life, even in peacetime, must give way to a plan which the military professionals deem necessary.

The bill, however, grants automatic deferment to the Vice President and governmental officers of all categories. In this instance, what is the meaning of deferment against the traditional exemption for such officers?

In section 7 (c) the bill gives some recognition to the importance of religion, providing that "The President shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe" defer training and service in the Army and Navy of men whose service is more important in industry and the professions. Among those whose service is thus to be deferred are "regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, in the regular discharge of their ministerial duties."

However, there is no provision in this bill for the exemption of those training for the ministry nor for those carrying on an actual ministry in religious education and charity.

Candidates for the priesthood are selected with great care, they are given a long preparatory training leading up to the study of theology. The seminary is not merely an educational institution, it is above all a place of formation for those priestly virtues and that mode of life which will enable the priest to serve Christ by example as well as by teaching and preaching and the administration of institutions of social charity. Any interruption in this strict discipline will work to the disadvantage of the individual candidates and to the great detriment of the church in the maintenance of her institutions.

In other selective compulsory draft acts, specifically the acts of 1917 and 1918, the Congress, acting even under stress of war, recognized the distinctive character of the minister and by statute exempted him and students of theology from the draft.

We believe that in any national-defense policy, such as the enactment of this bill would provide, this section 7 (c) should be amended and that after section 7 (b) a provision should be added exempting from the selective compulsory draft herein provided all priests in holy orders, ministers of religion, students who are preparing for the priesthood or ministry, and regular members of religious communities.

Just what does deferment mean in this bill? Does it mean deferred to a class to be called later than class I? Does it connote obligation on the part of the President? What area of choice is left to the President in the clause "under such regulations as he may prescribe"? What discretion in "deferment" will be left to the various 6,000 conscription officials throughout the country who will pass on registrants?

The citizen would be protected if Congress wrote definite exemptions and defined exactly what "deferment" meant. The bill eschews deferment by class and leaves the status of the individual applicant to the judgment of a local conscription-board functionary.

The elasticity of "deferment," as conceived in the military mind, is known from the language used in the proposed regulations to accompany the draft bill as designed by the Joint Army and Navy Selective Service Committee. In section 100B of the regulations we read:

"Ordinarily registrants placed in class I will be inducted into the public armed forces before registrants placed in any of the other classes, but nothing herein contained shall prevent the induction of any registrant, whatever his classification or order number, when the President deems it necessary in the national interest."

That is, the priest or minister of religion or other person who is deferred by Executive order may when the President deems it necessary be subjected to the selective draft.

In another place these regulations use much language to define the term "regular or duly ordained minister." The language is totally inadequate and would exclude from "deferment" bishops, college and university presidents, hospital administrators, and other classes of ordained and regular ministers who are in administrative, missionary, and general offices of the church.

I cite these regulations to inquire who will be charged with writing such regulations for the proposed legislation, if enacted. What norms will guard the 6,000 local conscription functionaries in interpreting the regulations?

This legislation is entirely too important to be left to haphazard conjecture. The acts of Congress even in wartime were more definitely and more justly written, and, besides, they accepted and followed the traditions of our country.

In view of the utter disregard in this bill for the normal recruiting of a clergy to carry on the religious, educational, and charitable works of the church, we ask respectfully that this committee and the Members of Congress generally give attention to the result which must inevitably follow. Just at a time when greater demands will be put on the church for supplying chaplains in the armed forces, in the extended Civilian Conservation Corps, and for social welfare work in cantonments, the church faces the loss of many candidates for the ministry because of the refusal to grant even a deferred status to seminarians. Nowhere in the present bill is any consideration given to this need. How can the church meet the new demands for chaplains and other personnel related to the defense program if students for the ministry are thought to be more necessary in military units? We are informed that the extended Army and Navy program already authorized calls for 500 priests. It is impossible to get candidates for the ministry as one would employees in industry.

We reject the thought that this present proposed legislation is any indication of a change in the possible attitude of Congress toward religion. That attitude has been and continues to be respectful of the liberty of the church in selecting and directing her ministers.

Experience in wartime is evidence that any loss of fighting personnel arising out of the exemption from the selective draft of ministers of religion and students for the ministry is not only meager, but generously compensated for by the advantage of morale, unity, and loyalty promoted and maintained among noncombatants by the clergy and among combatants by the officers of the Chaplain Corps.

It is our firm belief that there will be available a sufficient number of volunteers for service in the Chaplain Corps if ministers of religion and students for the ministry continue to be exempt from the draft.

We speak only for the Roman Catholic Church in the United States. To enforce provisions of law such as those now considered would dangerously interfere with the progress, even with the preservation of religion, and would result in grievous suffering and hardship to millions of families by depriving them of sacramental ministrations and would curtail an influence that contributes inestimably to the preservation of morale and the strengthening of national unity.

Experience shows that the normal increase of the Catholic population in the United States requires an increase of about 750 priests each year. In the school year 1935–36, for which complete statistics are available, 1,400 students were graduated from 93 theological seminaries in the United States. That number was barely sufficient to replace the deceased and superannuated and provide the increase called for by an increase in the Catholic population. It would be extremely difficult for the existing theological seminaries to provide additional priests for service in the Chaplain Corps. Adequate provision could not be made for the necessary normal demand for additional priests and at the same time for service with the increased military and naval forces.

Taking into consideration these facts, the Parliament of Great Britain, by the Armed Forces Act of 1939, exempted from military service all men in holy orders and regular ministers of religious denominations, and recent regulations added "church students and religious" to the schedule of reserved occupations—that is, gave them a specific vocation exemption from the draft. The rule applies to all "clergymen and church students of all denominations."

The British regulations define "theological student" as "a man established in his course as a student at an institution recognized by any religious denomination as a training institution for holy orders or for regular ministers of that denomination, while he continues as such a student and intends to qualify for holy orders or for appointment as a regular minister." This exemption is of particular reference, since all of us know what Great Britain has faced since September 1939.

Therefore we respectfully recommend that ministers of religion and students for the ministry of religion be specifically exempt from the selective compulsory military service proposals now under consideration.

Immunity from military service is inseparable from the right of a people to religious liberty. It is not a privilege conceded unfairly to the ministers of religion as a class. In respecting the immunity of the clergy from military service the state recognizes the right of the people at all times to practice their religion and to have available for that purpose the ministrations of their priests.

It is argued that to recognize the immunity of theological students would open the way for abuses. Too many would seek to enter theological seminaries to escape the draft.

There will be no rush of students to Catholic theological seminaries by men seeking to evade conscription. No student is admitted at any time to the seminary without evidence of fitness and without having completed at least 2 years of study in a liberal arts college. Ecclesiastical superiors would be bound to exercise even greater caution in times of crisis and would be even more severe and exacting in ascertaining whether or not an applicant truly has a vocation for the ministry. The church would not object to reasonable efforts by the state to prevent abuses. The state certainly might designate for exemption only the seminarians or divinity students enrolled in institutions which have been functioning for a specified number of years. Indeed such efforts would protect the church as well as the state, for to receive students or confer holy orders on candidates who had no vocation would harm the church and religion even more than it would the state.

Believing the proposed provisions of the bill as now drawn are contrary to our national traditions and national ideals, as well as hostile to the explicit declarations and laws of the church, we are confident that you Members of this Congress will wish to reexamine the whole question in relation to the points which we submit most respectfully.

Will We Do It?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial, I present the following from the Saturday Evening Post of July 6, 1940. I commend this editorial to the careful consideration of the Members of the House and all those who have access to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of July 6, 1940]

WILL WE DO IT?

We do not believe the great ways of thinking and feeling that have made this country what it is can be overthrown. They may be betrayed. Therefore we say—saying it bluntly as a challenge—that for a time already too long the American people have been out of character in their emotional premises, in their reactions to evil, and in their choice of mentors and leadership. And if the principle of free government were really in danger in the world, it would be owing less to the rise of the totalitarian powers than to the softness of a people upon whom freedom has conferred incomparable gifts.

Not the first bad sign, perhaps, but certainly a very wrong turn, was when the country followed the magicians who said there was an easy way out of depression. Repudiation of debts and contracts, debasement of money, inflation, confiscation, redistribution of the national income by law; then recovery, the more abundant life, less work for more pay, and security forever—all of that was wishful thinking.

Such was the beginning of a headlong flight from individual responsibility. It was the beginning of a dangerous habit of soft living unearned. We presented the spectacle of a people trying to consume more than they produced and able for a while to do it because they had been so rich. We had the finest industrial machine in the world, and for 7 years we have been consuming it. Do you know what that means? Take a single fact as it was stated by Mr. Hoover, that according to a recent census of machine tools in the United States, 70 percent of them now are more than 10 years old, whereas in 1932 only 52 percent of them were more than 10 years old. And no move had been made to enforce an embargo up to June 4.

All this time certain hungry nations commonly called the have-nots, and first among these the German people, were working twice as hard as we were, consuming not more but much less than they produced, in order by heroic self-denial to create a surplus. We were purposely destroying our surplus, saying it was ruinous. They were putting theirs into war machines, with intent, when they were ready, to turn them on the soft democracies and take from them what they wanted.

We knew it; we watched them doing it. Behaving as if our power were still intact, we warned them not to do what they were intending to do. Yet they went on as if we had said nothing. They knew what we had done to our strength, that we had let our armaments rust.

From here on it is painful. When the war the Germans had been preparing was imminent, what did this country, the richest, most powerful republic that ever lived on earth—what did it do? It adopted the thesis that its own first line of defense was in France. It would not itself go to the battlefield. Never. Yet the aggressor had to be stopped; the free governments of the world must stand together. Therefore, it would sell food, supplies, planes, and war munitions to France and England, provided they came in their own ships to get them and paid cash; it changed its neutrality laws accordingly, and argued as it did so that it was helping to save democracy, keeping itself out of war, and doing business, all at the same time. And such was the leadership the people followed, apparently unaware that if the thesis were true, their country's behavior was pusillanimous.

The thesis was false. Our first line of defense was not in Europe. It was here. American civilization, that is our own possession. It could not be saved in Europe or defended there. We are its sole defenders and it can be saved only here.

Well, then, the war came, and suddenly it appeared that the strength of the aggressor had been fatally underestimated. Thereupon a great voice was heard in many places at once, as if it were the American voice, saying we must rush to the side of the Allies with material aid—with credit, munitions, anything but men—because it would be cheaper and more intelligent to do that than to let the war come to us, and because (we quote it exactly): "The success of the Allies is vital to us."

We do not believe that was the American voice. It was the voice of fear, to say no worse of it. "Vital" is not a word to be misunderstood. It means something essential to life. Was it the American voice saying the life of this American Republic was at stake on the outcome of a war in Europe, even such a thing as the fall of the British Empire? Never had the American spirit a voice like that.

May came. The historian who examines the American newspapers for the month of May 1940 may wonder how much of ourselves we saw in that mirror.

What had happened? The power of the German war machine had been revealed, its triumph was a definite possibility, the fall of the British Empire was imaginable; and the American mind passed through the strangest experience of its life. The emotion was that of dread, acted upon by hysterical mentorship. If we may speak of the national mind, certainly never had its behavior been so unimportant, so weak against the impact of deformed ideas crashed forth before they were born, such as the idea that we should forsake our political traditions and name Mr. Roosevelt on both party tickets, because that would be a demonstration of unity, meaning mass-mindedness, and it would be dangerous in this emergency to change leadership.

The President's own first contribution was a defense message, hastily prepared, in which he suggested how easy it would be for an aggressor to get here with bombs unless we were prepared to stop him en route, which we were not. He imagined that adequate American preparedness would require 50,000 airplanes and then asked the Congress to increase the regular Army and Navy appropriations by a sum not much more than the amount it was voting for the W. P. A. program. Less than 2 weeks later he was saying to the reporters at a White House press conference, as reported in the New York Times, "that there was no reason for the country to become 'discomboomerated.' The women of the country would not have to give up their cosmetics, lipsticks, and chocolate sodas in consequence of the preparedness program. * * * The whole idea was that the present state of international affairs called for an outlay of about a billion and a quarter dollars over and above the two billions that were being spent on the Military and Naval Establishments." Three days later he was saying, in another message to Congress, that "the almost incredible events of the last 2 weeks" made it necessary to appropriate another billion for defense.

While the Germans were doing without butter and buying one cigarette at a time in order to have guns, we were changing our automobiles once a year. "We have not manufactured a big gun for many years," says General Marshall, our Chief of Staff, "but it would take about two and a half years to make a 16-inch gun and carriage," for the coast defense.

We are not prepared to fight the aggressor. Yet we defy him. He shall not make us give up any of our social gains, says the President. He shall not upset the normal American way of life. American women shall have their cosmetics still, in spite of him. Preparedness the easiest way.

If the Government knows what the problem is, comprehends it even dimly, it is treating the American people as if they were children unable to bear reality. If it does not know, its incompetence, hitherto an economic disaster only, may come to be remembered as a calamity.

The problem is not that we stand alone in this hemisphere, with not one powerful friend in the world to help us defend it. When was it that we stood not alone here? Where was that powerful friend in the world ever willing to help us defend American civilization? We are sick of hearing that the British Navy all this time has been defending our Monroe Doctrine. More than once we had been willing to fight the British Navy for it. Our part is to stand alone for so long as we have the hardihood, the spirit and the fortitude to do it, and when we haven't, we may as well stop talking about American destiny.

No; the problem is that a balanced distribution of power in the world has been upset. A new and frightful power has appeared, an offensive power, moved by an unappeasable earth hunger, conscious of no right but the right of might. It does not threaten this country with invasion, at least, not yet. It does threaten the Western Hemisphere by economic and political designs in the Latin American countries, and this, for us, is an ominous fact. But the larger aspect of what has happened is that the world is in a state of unbalance. Until an equal defensive power has been created in the hands of people who prefer peace to war, there will be no safe living in it, no security for free government.

Who shall create that equal defensive power and restore the balance? You have only to ask the question to get the answer. There is one country in the whole world that can do it. In that simple sense it is the United States against Germany, now or later. And that is not to speak of war. It is the minimum price of peace.

The cost of doing it, in terms of self-discipline, harder living, more work, may be terrific. This is the truth that we have so far declined to face. It might well cost us, not some billions more or less to be voted by Congress, not a 10-percent increase of the income tax, but possibly a quarter of our total national exertions for several years. There is no easier way. A thousand airplanes a day, if necessary. That is the American voice. It is possible. But how many of us realize what we should have to do without for a thousand airplanes a day? What we will, that we can do.

Proposed Investigation of Pulp and Paper Industry Unnecessary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

LETTER FROM R. A. HAYWARD, PRESIDENT OF KALAMAZOO VEGETABLE PARCHMENT CO.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, an investigation of the pulp and paper industry of America has been proposed in a resolution recently introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER]. This investigation, I am convinced, would result in an unnecessary expenditure of Government funds and would seriously affect the paper industry at this time.

I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. R. A. Hayward, president of the Kalamazoo Vegetable Parchment Co., of Kalamazoo, Mich., which I believe should be read by every Member of Congress who is of the opinion that the proposed investigation should be made. In this letter Mr. Hayward, who is one of the best-informed paper manufacturers of the Nation, ably gives his reasons why the resolution by the gentleman from South Carolina should not be favorably considered.

Mr. Hayward's letter follows:

KALAMAZOO VEGETABLE PARCHMENT CO.,
Kalamazoo, Mich., July 25, 1940.

The Hon. PAUL SHAFER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR PAUL: I have had called to my attention the House Resolution No. 576, calling for a complete investigation of the Pulp and Paper Industry by the Department of Agriculture.

Knowing intimately, as I do, the entire operation of the industry, I know that such an investigation would be a complete waste of our taxpayers' money and would be a burden on the executives of the pulp and paper industry who are now struggling night and day to make ends meet.

We are now having investigations by every other department in Washington, and if there is any question of monopolistic practice in the industry, can it not be referred to the Department of Justice so that they can carry along the investigation with the same men who are now working in the industry?

This resolution points out that the price of paper has increased from $65 to $85 per ton. This is not a statement of fact, showing that the gentleman who introduced this resolution did not know the truth or he would be more accurate in his statements.

The price of bleached sulphite pulp has increased from $55 per ton up to $75 per ton which is a $20 increase in the cost of pulp.

I know that every domestic manufacturer selling pulp at this price could sell the same pulp for export at $10 to $20 more than this price. I think they should be given credit for stabilizing the domestic market and not taking advantage of a temporary opportunity to export the pulp.

The price of paper has increased about $10 per ton—so that the paper manufacturer is having now to absorb at least $10 per ton because of the difference in the increase in their costs of raw materials and the increase in their selling prices.

The profits for our company for the first 6 months of this year were 20 percent less than the first 6 months of last year.

I think these few simple facts will illustrate why we think any investigation of this kind is absolutely useless and worthless at this time.

I hope you will agree with our viewpoint and oppose this resolution and see if you can direct the rest of the Congress to do something that will help stimulate business instead of further hampering it.

Yours sincerely,

(Signed) R. A. HAYWARD.

Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL BY THE ALTUS (OKLA.) TIMES-DEMOCRAT

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to incorporate an excellent editorial printed by the Altus Times-Democrat of Altus, Okla., on the compulsory military training bill. The editorial was written by Harrington Wimberly, editor of the paper and a member of the University of Oklahoma board of regents.

A dozen raw recruits for Uncle Sam's Army got on a bus we rode out of Oklahoma City last night. They were genuine Okies gathered by the Tulsa recruiting office from the hills of eastern Oklahoma. Not one appeared to be over 20 years old and one lad in the crowd could have passed for 16. Quite obviously they were from relief families and they were joining the Army for a meal ticket. The boys stated that they had passed physical examinations, although one youngster looked anemic and another had a bad cough.

We applaud the patriotism of those boys and we hope Uncle Sam takes good care of them. But one thing is sure: The Army is hard up for new recruits, or better selections would be made. Not over two or three in that gang are physically fit at this time for hard labor and some of them never will be. The undernourished lad might make a hand at peeling potatoes, but we doubt if he could handle a big gun within the next 2 years.

The men for this great army of defense that America is trying to organize must not come alone from families on relief. This war business is not a W. P. A. project. It is unfair as well as dangerous to fill the Army and Navy with jobless boys who have nothing else to do. If an emergency exists—and all agree that such is the case—then recruiting must be done on an emergency basis.

The boys from the country clubs are not enlisting in the Army and they are not going to. The exclusive fraternity houses at the universities and colleges throughout the country will be filled as usual this fall. Young men with good-paying jobs or parents who can support them in ease are not going to work up a patriotic fever to the point of signing up with Uncle Sam for 3 years. They might be interested in an officer's commission, but the Army needs buck privates who can do hard labor and who will submit to discipline and intensive training. The care-free youth with a check book and a roadster will have to give up his luxuries and freedom if he joins the Army, and he is not going to do it until he has to. There won't be any dancing until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning and sleeping until noon in a training camp.

America's army of defense must come from homes of all classes and all economic circumstances, and the only fair way to mobilize it is by a selective and compulsory training system. God grant that the boys will never come within the range of an enemy's fire; but, if so, every home in America must be prepared to make its sacrifice.

The problem is to defend our democracy and our freedom and the job is not the exclusive responsibility of boys who can't find anything else to do. Rich and poor alike must render service, and a compulsory selection is the only method that will fill the ranks with all classes. The boys from the slums and the squatter cabins in the hills are not going to be happy if they discover they are fighting the battles for the young men who stay home because it's so much nicer—and safer.

It is taken for granted that the United States needs an army. Voluntary enlistments are coming in slowly and generally from the down-and-out class. There are exceptions but they are hard to find. Compulsory training will give the Army the strength it needs in both numbers and morale. This is not a poor man's fight and it must not be a rich man's victory. When it comes to defending America and a democracy that permits us to live as free men and women, a bank account cannot be an exemption or the tragic fall of France will be duplicated in the Western Hemisphere.

Challenge to St. Louis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS CALL

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, the patriotism of the American Negro has never been questioned. As a group, there is none in our country more solidly and devotedly anxious to bear its part in the present national-defense program. Under leave granted, it gives me pleasure to include the following editorial from the St. Louis Call, a newspaper of distinction and standing, enjoying a wide circulation among our Negro citizens. Its brilliant editor, Chester E. Stovall, has cogently expressed some of the thoughts of our colored citizens today. They want to share, and share proportionately and substantially in this national enterprise now engaging our best thought and energies. Let us see to it that they have the opportunity.

The editorial follows:

[From the St. Louis Call of July 12, 1940]

CHALLENGE TO ST. LOUIS

To: Our fellow white citizens of St. Louis and Missouri.
From: A group of Negro citizens.
Subject: Suggestions on Strengthening Our National-Defense Program.

The people of the United States, of whom the Negro citizens are an important one-tenth, are being called upon to fulfill their patriotic duty toward our national-defense program. As in the past, we Negro citizens are prepared to prove our unwavering loyalty and allegiance to our country.

We witness and live in a time when the darkest pages of human history are being written. We witness with horror the destruction of life and of great social values. We see the havoc caused by the action of dangerous "fifth columnists." We see the demoralization caused by lack of national unity in nations, and we know that prejudice and political interests have been the cause of these tragedies.

We ask therefore, in the name of national security, whether our leaders believe that death and destruction will discriminate between whites and Negroes. The graveyards of Europe prove the contrary to us. We ask these leaders whether they believe that airplanes reaping their harvest from the skies will stop at the color line or at the Mason and Dixon's line? We ask these leaders whether they believe that national unity can come out of Jim Crowism, segregation, and prejudice?

We believe that if America is to reach its maximum in productive power, in military strength and morale, the Negro people must be fully integrated into the Nation's industrial and commercial life, into its political and community life, and into its armed forces. At this point we emphasize the fact which is unknown to the general public, that, contrary to the democratic principle, Negro men are denied enrollment in the present aviation training courses in St. Louis because to qualify they must be enrolled in Washington or St. Louis Universities or Jefferson College, none of which—their names to the contrary—will admit Negro students. Negro soldiers are effectively barred from the mechanized units of the Army; restricted to mess attendants in the Navy; and barred absolutely from the Marine Corps. They are excluded from Missouri's units of the National Guard.

Our white American leaders must learn, and they must learn quickly, that national unity and that democracy are indivisible. They can know no color line.

Accordingly, we submit to our fellow white Americans the following proposals, and we plead with all, both individually and in organizations, to set in motion ways and means of achieving these objectives as evidence of their interest in our Nation's defense, and as evidence of their devotion to American democracy.

We propose:

1. That the chamber of commerce urge all of its members and affiliated groups to drop the color line in the employment, assignment, and payment of workers.
2. That those trade-unions that now by constitution, ritual, or tradition bar Negro workers discontinue this practice.
3. That Missouri's Congressmen, with the aid of the Governor and the mayor of St. Louis, go about opening the doors of all units of our armed forces, including the National Guard, to qualified Negro men.
4. That on all committees and in all major services having to do with the national defense competent Negro citizens be democratically included.
5. That in the proposed program for the training of skilled workers to meet our defense needs Negro young people be given the same opportunity accorded to all other young people.
6. That relief standards be raised in keeping with sound national defense.

Missouri is in the heart of our great Nation. Let it therefore take the lead in the execution of this program, which would undoubtedly strengthen our defenses and vitalize our democracy.

For greater national defense, and for a more vigorous democracy, we are,

Respectfully yours,

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MON C. WALLGREN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. PATRICK J. BOLAND, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. WALLGREN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. PATRICK J. BOLAND, over Station WGBI, Scranton, Pa., Sunday, July 28, 1940.

The future of this country is the most important question which presents itself to the American people at this time.

No one can dispute the positive fact that we will be in a far more vulnerable position for attack from foreign sources after the war is over than we are at the present time, and no one can prophesy what conditions will confront us 30 days from now or 1 year from today.

We will hear many diversified opinions and perhaps much criticism of the President and his policies; yes, no doubt, there will be much oratory against his nomination for a third term.

It is my opinion that this will be a minor issue in the coming campaign and will fade into insignificance because of the great necessity of our people to become united upon the great objective to preserve our democratic institutions and this great democracy.

I can recall quite vividly a year ago when Congress was considering the much-talked-of neutrality bill, many Members of Congress, newspaper editors, and commentators stated that if we should repeal the Arms Embargo Act, it would be the first step toward our becoming involved in the European war.

All through the debate of this legislation that school of thought was presented to the American people with such force that letter after letter and petitions came to my office from mothers and sons who believed that if we repealed the arms embargo, immediately the youth of America would be marching the streets going off to war.

These statements were not based upon facts because we are not engaged in war, and the President's recent statement to Congress convinces all of us, who will allow ourselves to be convinced, that we will not send our boys to Europe.

I quote the President's words here:

"That we are opposed to war is known not only to every American but to every government in the world. We will not use our arms in a war of aggression. We will not send our men to take part in European wars."

That statement alone should satisfy the people, regardless of what his most-hated enemies might say to the contrary.

We heard it said many times that:

"The President is trying to get us into war."

"Whatever he does means war."

"This fellow Roosevelt in the White House is not a peaceful man, he is a warrior."

Very well; let us see what he said in answering these unjust statements. Again I quote:

"Let no man or group in any walk of life assume exclusive protectorate over the future well-being of America, because I conceive that, regardless of party or section, the mantle of peace and patriotism is wide enough to cover us all. Let no group assume the exclusive label of the peace bloc. We all belong to it."

Several times during the past 7 years the President advised the people and their Representatives in Congress of grave dangers threatening the United States and its people and the institutions of democracy everywhere.

Time after time he availed himself of opportunities to reassert and to implement the right of all nations of the American Hemisphere to freedom from attack or control by any non-American power.

In September of last year the horror of war again broke out, and the President called Congress into special session, and on the 21st of that month in his message he said:

"This Government must lose no time or effort to keep this Nation from being drawn into the war."

In January 1940 he recommended to the present Congress the expansion of the personnel of the Army, Navy, Coast Guard, and Federal Bureau of Investigation, and submitted estimates for national defense amounting to approximately $2,000,000,000.

Again on May 16 of this year he pointed out that the swift and shocking developments forced every neutral nation to look to its defenses in the light of new factors loosed by the brutal force of modern offensive war.

He also called attention to the "fifth column," by which persons supposed to be peaceful visitors were actually a part of an enemy unit of occupation.

He at that time asked for an additional sum of $1,182,000,000 for defense purposes.

Again on May 31, 1940, he sent a message to Congress stating that almost incredible events have happened within the past 2 weeks that necessitated the enlargement of our military program and asked for an appropriation of $1,277,741,170.

And in less than 2 months' time he came to Congress in person and delivered a most far-reaching message not only to the people of the United States but to the whole world. He said on that day that:

"We, the free men and women of the United States with memories of our fathers to inspire us and the hopes of our children to sustain us are determined to be strong as well as free. We fully understand the threat of the new enslavement in which men may not speak, may not listen, may not think. As these threats become more numerous and their dire meaning more clear, it deepens the determination of the American people to meet them with wholly adequate defense."

He asked that day for an additional authorization of $4,881,171,957 for national defense or a total for this year of $9,340,913,127, and Congress has appropriated this vast sum to make our country secure.

History will record the unerring judgment of President Roosevelt, who as no other individual in this country, saw the approach almost 3 years ago of the present world calamity.

In the city of Chicago in October 1937 he courageously pointed to the approaching danger to civilization. He was attempting by that speech to fire the imagination of the American people to such a point that he might recommend at that time the type and kind of preparation for defense on which we are so feverishly and furiously working at this very moment.

But the American people were in no mood for such advice. They felt secure. Why, even 6 months ago had the Congress of the United States attempted to put through a $5,000,000,000 program for national defense, you would not have a dozen Members of Congress voting for it.

At that time we were all of the opinion that the war between Germany and France was a phony or cream-puff war.

We know now how wrong we have been in not realizing the danger we were in, and now we are confronted with the great necessity of a united cooperation of all our people.

Nations in almost every continent who have believed in our way of life have become victims of ruthless aggression because they were not prepared to resist those who would destroy them.

Cities, homes, industries, nations, and civilizations are today threatened as they have not been threatened in all the recorded history of man.

The inventive genius of man which has brought to mankind the means of a better life now threatens to destroy that life and all the things which make it worth living.

We in America rest under a tremendous obligation.

More than a century ago James Monroe inaugurated the doctrine that bears his name, that the Americas were to be the proving grounds of a new democracy, which should be set up in the Western Hemisphere for the service and enjoyment of the peoples of this hemisphere, and also as an example for the rest of the world.

We have thus far defended, preserved, and extended it, but we cannot assume that wishing alone will continue to make it so. We cannot assume that those who have no respect for democratic governments elsewhere will respect ours in America. They respect only those whom they fear or whom they know to be able to withstand their assaults.

We want peace in America. We have drawn more closely together throughout North, South, and Central America, not because we have any designs upon our neighbors; not because we want anything they have save their friendship and their cooperation, but because we know that in unity there is strength and that the problem of protecting democracy and liberty in any part of America is the problem of protecting it in all America.

We want peace throughout the world. There is no nation on earth against which we desire to become an aggressor. We pray that civilization and applied Christianity may yet triumph and lift their bruised heads above the scream of shells and the roar of devastating planes and tanks and all the agencies of death and incredible horror.

But as we have toiled in this land to develop our free institutions, and we have fought to create a nation devoted to freedom and equality; as we have sacrificed treasure to improve the standards of life for men and women here, so shall we struggle to the limit of our capacity to preserve these things from corrosive or destructive influences within our borders no less than from any ruthless juggernaut that may assail us from without.

Therefore we shall be ready. We shall prepare. We shall arm that we may not be caught unawares like so many others have been caught in the holocaust which now sweeps over so much of the world.

In this great task there is no room for partisan rancor or selfish aggrandizement. It serves no purpose now to blame one or another man or group for not knowing years in advance what the world was coming to. From 1921 to 1932 we deluded ourselves with the belief that wars of aggression were at an end; that each nation might pursue in peace its own purposes so long as those purposes did not infringe on the rights of others. We signed treaties of disarmament. We signed treaties of arbitration. We renounced, with all the world, war as an instrument of national policy. Navies were reduced. The world rejoiced that at last an era of peace had come upon it.

The world has learned its bitter lesson. Treaties supposed to have been sacred have been thrown into wastebaskets. Territory that was supposed to be inviolate has been ravaged. Men, women, and children whose only offense was that they were human beings have been murdered and driven from their homes. Throughout the world mankind is now inquiring whether Christianity is a mockery and whether civilization can survive.

In the midst of all this we find the oceans narrowing and the world contracting. We are again realizing that we are a part of the world and that there is no assurance that the lust for power and wealth may not seek to engulf our Nation and our people in the catastrophe which has overtaken others.

In the midst of these threats we call upon our people for unity. We know that call will find a response in the hearts of all our people, regardless of race, color, nationality, or condition. We know that Jew and gentile, Catholic and Protestant, white and colored, rich and poor, native-born and foreign-born, will rise to the task which faces us. The hosts of free America will protect the freedom of America under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, not because he was elected as a Democrat but because he is the President of the United States and the spokesman of our people. We trust him because he has guided the Nation out of the depths of a cruel despondency in our domestic affairs. We trust him to guide us in the solution of our international affairs.

As a humble participant in the events of recent years in Washington, I am proud to proclaim the accomplishments of the Roosevelt regime. I am proud to have had a part in these events. You likewise are proud of these unprecedented advances.

We all know that this is a solemn hour for the entire democratic world, and we also realize that we, in the United States, are now facing one of the most critical periods of our entire history. With the greatest possible speed we must prepare to the limit on every front.

Only through the utmost of preparedness, quickly and efficiently brought to pass, can we be sure of peace on this continent. In this tremendous effort all of us will be needed.

Each one of us must contribute his or her part. The time is here for every free citizen of our country to show his patriotic love for this glorious land.

But let us remember that we are defending a way of life and not merely a national sovereignty. We cannot defend that way of life successfully by arms unless we are constantly defending it by living it. United, trusting in Almighty God, and in each other we shall protect this great democracy and its people.

March of Aggressors Threatens Democracies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

RESOLUTION OF YOUNG DEMOCRATIC CLUBS OF AMERICA

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution which was unanimously adopted by the national committee of the Young Democratic Clubs of America:

We believe that the march of aggressors throughout the world threatens democracies everywhere. Our sympathies naturally flow toward those democratic countries which have fallen before this march, which are resisting this aggression or may be called upon to fight in the future for their freedom. We support wholeheartedly this administration's policy of translating these sympathies into an active program of giving all material aid to these countries.

The youth of America stands firmly behind President Roosevelt's declaration that "We will not use our arms in a war of aggression; we will not send our men to take part in European wars."

The defense of this Nation is bound irrevocably to the protection of the Western Hemisphere. We therefore solidly support this administration's interpretation of the principles of the Monroe Doctrine and all efforts to protect them along cultural and economic lines.

Members of the Young Democratic Clubs of America are willing and anxious to make any sacrifice for the defense of our country. The young men realize that the cause of preparedness and their own self-interest demand that they be trained now for any eventuality. Therefore, they endorse a program of service to the Government—a program that calls into service all young men, either for training in the armed forces or in civilian and vocational fields. Compulsory military service alone does not meet all the needs for this Nation's defense Simultaneous training in civilian and industrial lines not only buttresses the effectiveness of our land and sea forces, but also equips the young men of this country for jobs and a more successful career in our democracy.

We believe the social gains of the past 7 years have preserved and strengthened our democracy at a time when democracies everywhere have been in danger. Because of this conviction we do not subscribe to any hysterical demands for scrapping of this social program. It should be noted that much of the clamor for repeal of various phases of the social program comes from persons and organizations which opposed enactment of the vital measures into law.

We know that the young men and young women of this country are determined to protect the social program that, since 1933, has reopened the door to education, jobs, and other opportunity for them. We believe that this administration's concern with the preservation of civil liberties during these strenuous times deserves every commendation and support. The traditional American freedoms must be preserved, and our democracy must remain a form of government actively working for the well-being of all the people, if we are to present the strongest front against the totalitarian threat.

We, the young men and young women of American democracy, want no part of totalitarian government. We regret that some small segment of the American people toy vicariously with notions of corporate states and other "streamlined forms of government" that have swallowed peoples who once were free.

We, the young men and young women of American democracy, are militantly opposed to all dictatorships. When we say dictatorships, we mean those countries whose philosophies are destructive to everything Americans hold dear. We mean those totalitarian governments of Germany, Italy, and Japan. And we mean Russia, too.

Manufactured War Hysteria

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the manufactured war hysteria—war fear unquestionably manufactured for political purposes by the New Deal administration—the Congress was well on the way to reassuming its "rubber stamp" character of the New Deal panic days until an organized and vocal minority began to call a halt and demand that some of these mobilization schemes and conscription plans be looked into with more care and consideration.

The result of that minority opposition has been not in the least to impair any rational or reasonable plan for national defense, but to prevent the administration from carrying the Congress and the country along on a wave of war hysteria that was threatening to disrupt the whole economic system of the United States if not called to a halt.

It is little short of absurd to talk about drafting men from the ages of 18 to 64. The fact is, and every reputable naval and military officer will so testify before the committees of the Congress, that we could not properly train and equip an army of 2,000,000 men in the next 2 years, no matter how hard we might try nor no matter how much money Congress would appropriate.

It must always be kept in mind that appropriations alone do not constitute a national defense in any sense of the word. The spending of vast sums of money does not constitute a national defense. Military and naval authorities have already warned the country time and again that men without machines, airplanes, tanks, guns, ships, submarines, ammunition, uniforms, and all of the other paraphernalia a soldier must have, would not constitute a national defense. On the other hand, all the machines, airships, guns, seaships, submarines, land tanks, and bombs that could be manufactured would be practically useless without men trained in their operation. The training of men involves a time element and the manufacture of all these mechanical weapons involves a time element.

If the conscription act were amended to include only those from the ages of 20 to 30, at least 10,000,000 men would be made available for service. Counting out the unfit, those with dependents, those more valuable in industry, and for every other cause, and bringing the percentage of those chosen down to one-fifth, we would still have 2,000,000 men for training and equipment. Every responsible naval and military man knows, and many have testified, that an army of 2,000,000 men could not be equipped and properly trained in the next 2 years regardless of the amounts of money appropriated.

This is to say nothing of the testimony given by a high ranking officer of the General Staff before the House Military Affairs Committee in January of this year in which he said that with 480,000 men properly equipped, all the nations of Europe combined with full control of the high seas could not land one corps of troops on American shores.

Therefore, in the light of these facts, this ill-conceived proposition—hysterical chatter is an excellent term for it—of mobilizing and registering all male citizens from 18 to 64 is grotesque. The people will not forget, incidentally, that only a few weeks ago the President was talking about registering women as well as men. He was going to conscript the girls between the ages of 18 and 20.

This whole proposition shows its hysterical character all the more plainly when we stop to realize that in the last few months the congressional appropriations and contractual authority grants, which are substantially equal to cash, aggregate more than $10,000,000,000 and the President is asking for something like five billions additional.

It is perfectly evident that the administration has gone hog wild on this whole question and is trying to drive the country hog wild along with it.

A very substantial opposition is rapidly arising in Congress irrespective of party lines against this sort of ill-considered procedure, and it behooves the taxpayers of this country to advise their Congressmen by wire or letter to scan these proposals more carefully before giving the administration the green light for going as far as it apparently desires in calling out the National Guard for service anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, and for conscripting millions of citizens who could be neither trained nor equipped in the next 2 or 3 years.

There is no question about the desire of the Republican minority in the Congress to give every assistance in creating a national defense, but the Republicans want a national defense created on a scientific, common-sense, economical, and practical basis.

Of course, everybody in the Government, in Congress, and in the Military Establishment knows they cannot possibly spend, sensibly and economically, in the next 2 years, the money already placed at their disposal.

EDITORIAL FROM THE DETROIT FREE PRESS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, before this last great democracy surrenders the liberties of its citizens on the excuse that it is necessary to save the democracies of Europe; before we rush headlong into conscription in peacetime, it is well that we do a little sober thinking.

Three outstanding authorities have expressed opinions as to the imminence and the reality of the suggested danger to our country. An editorial of the Detroit Free Press gives their opinions and it is here inserted:

[From the Detroit Free Press of July 31, 1940]

DEMOCRACY, CONSCRIPTION'S VICTIM?

The congressional hearings on the proposed conscription bill should be deliberate enough to determine three things:

How much is the demand for a total military and civilian dictatorship over the manpower of the Nation due to a realistic attitude?

How much is it due to plain hysteria?

How much of it is due to politics?

These questions should be fully answered now so that the people may have complete understanding.

A peacetime totalitarianism is a far graver violation of tradition than any proposal for a third term.

The latter is a simple issue. The people understand it and have a right to accept or reject it as they please.

But compulsory service for all men between the ages of 18 to 64, with broad authority for the President to call on anybody as he chooses for any kind of duty, military or otherwise, is another matter. It is not easily understood.

The American people are being asked to give away their liberties with no assurance that they will ever get them back.

They are being led to believe that war is imminent. It is characteristic of Americans to respond instinctively to any call to patriotic duty.

It is not at all surprising that one poll shows 67 percent of the people are in favor of some form of conscription. They responded in the same manner when President Wilson issued his draft call.

But are they not now voting in the same spirit in the belief that we either are already at war or are about to be plunged into one?

Is it not possible that they have been whipped into such a fever of emotionalism that they believe this is the one way to save America?

If that is the case, they have been misled.

The best of our military experts do not believe that any such massing of manpower—42,000,000 men and boys—is necessary.

At the outside figure they are interested only in an army of 750,000 soldiers. More, they would not know what to do with the 2,000,000 men Mr. Roosevelt talks about.

What of the other 40,000,000? Out of the clouds of oratory and tub thumping, the idea seems to loom that they would be regimented into various industries and civic duties—regimented as was the total manpower of Germany.

As to this phase of the problem the career men in the Army have nothing to say. That is all outside their tasks. They might get 2,000,000 men but any politically minded administration would have complete control over the other 40,000,000.

"But," the war-minded at Washington, in both parties, argue, "this is necessary if we are to meet the Hitler invasion when it comes."

"When it comes." That is the spur. Yet military experts have no idea that it is coming next week or next year or the year after, if ever. The career men cannot talk. However, the Free Press here offers quotations from three world famous writers on military matters who are not given to hysterics; who are not running for office, and who strive hard to see things as they are.

First, there is Col. Frederick Palmer, recognized as one of the greatest living authorities on war. He was the official press representative for the A. E. F. in France and was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal for his work. For years, though an American, he was the military expert for the London Times.

Is he excited? Not a bit. He says:

"Whence and in what strength will any attack upon us come? * * * Will our impatience for speed in our vast preparations defeat the very object for which we are striving?"

Japan? He points out that Japan has its hands full right now with China and will have for some years to come without taking us on. "This," he says, "dismisses any immediate danger on the Pacific coast."

But there is the Atlantic—and Hitler. Palmer calls attention to the simple fact that neutral military observers now agree that Germany had no "wonder army that wrought a military miracle." Germany really had no opposition, with France collapsing before a real fight started.

"Consequently there is no reason why we should be scared or overimpressed by German might as touched by some kind of hellish totalitarian magic."

Palmer even questions that Hitler can possibly defeat England across those 22 miles of turbulent waters. But, supposing he does? What then?

"Hitherto, Hitler's sea tactics have been negative and destructive. Now he must have surface sea command himself. His position is reversed. He must protect his convoys across the Atlantic."

Palmer first predicts the failure of the British campaign and then shows how utterly impossible it would be for Hitler to bring his army across to our shores. The danger is not immediate. "Our danger is," he concludes, "that we shall get an extravagant, unbalanced preparedness whose continuance we shall neglect when we are lulled into security, with the result that one day an enemy, or group of enemies, will get the jump on us."

This is taking the long view, a consideration of the years and not the days.

The whole program for conscription could go over until after the fevers of the coming election without in any way endangering America as long as industry maintains equipment production. Then we might think more sanely.

The President has asked that the National Guard be mobilized to meet some immediate danger, the nature of which he does not state. If the guard is called out it will take 6 months at least to furnish it sufficient equipment to put it on a battle-worthy basis.

The Presidential campaign will be over in 3 months. So what could be done with 2,000,000 raw civilians in that time?

This rush program does not make sense.

Second, there is Hanson W. Baldwin, military expert for the New York Times. How could Germany land a sufficient number of troops on this continent to require such a vast standing army to overcome them? He says:

"The maximum initial force that could be transported, even if control of the sea were wrested from us, would not be much larger than 50,000 men. The transportation of such a force would require 375,000 tons of shipping, perhaps 40 ships, about the largest force that could conveniently be convoyed in a single operation.

"To supply such a force might require from 650,000 tons of shipping to 2,000,000 tons monthly; in other words, perhaps half of the tonnage of the German merchant marine would have to be devoted solely to the job of supplying 50,000 soldiers. If this force were to be doubled, the shipping tonnage necessary would be doubled; to supply an army of 1,000,000 men in this hemisphere would require at the very least 13,000,000 tons of shipping.

"Economically and commercially the problem seems impossible; not even Britain or a combination of Britain and Germany has sufficient shipping to divert such an enormous amount of it from their ordinary and vital trade routes to military purposes."

The third of this triumvirate of famed military authorities is Maj. George Fielding Eliot, war expert for the New York Herald Tribune and Life magazine, and author of the widely read book on American preparedness, The Ramparts We Watch.

"Nothing could be worse," he writes, "than to give our own people and the peoples of the rest of the world the idea that we are going to have, or are even on the point of creating, a vast citizen army of millions. We cannot do this for a long time.

"We ought not to try to build up such an army on any half-baked basis. If we have learned anything from the present war, it is the need of ample training. Let us all know exactly what we are doing; let us all know, not just the White House coterie and the general staff.

"Let us not forget we are primarily a sea power. * * * There may be other ways of improving the national morale besides spending more than is necessary on any army which, if it passes the size needful for hemisphere missions, may well become an instrument useful only for overseas adventures—perhaps for a ghastly holocaust in Europe.

"We should be quite clear on one point: That we do not propose to furnish the manpower for any invasion of the European continent. It will be much better not to create any instrument of war which can be useful for that purpose.

"It all gets back to the lack of any coordinated, well-weighed plan for our defense. * * * We should do our thinking now while we have the time. And we should appoint able and experienced experts to do the job of translating thought into concrete and complete plans upon which to base our expenditures and our labors."

By common public acceptance these three men know what they are talking about. They are nonemotional and nonpolitical students of military preparedness and the arts of warfare.

The Free Press does not question the sincerity of President Roosevelt in his drive for preparedness, but it is forced at times to question his judgment because, in the very ardor of his cause, he lets his enthusiasm and his emotions run away with him—as is well evidenced by that "Stab in the back" speech at Charlottesville and his proposal to "quarantine aggressor nations" in his Chicago address in 1937.

The issue involves too vital a change in our whole concept of American life not to speak out bluntly about it.

The American people should not be lulled to sleep by grandiose talk. Our dangers from abroad are not one-half so real as the danger within our own borders. It may well be that the very life of democracy itself is at stake here.

Why, then, all the mad, precipitate rush?

If the Members of the United States Congress do not weigh carefully all the factors involved, if they do not permit the people full and open hearings so that they will have complete understanding, then they will be derelict in their duty and recreant to a sacred trust.

Let the people know that once they have bent their necks to the yoke of regimentation there is no turning back. The bands will play martial music, the flags will fly—and we, a once free people, may march to the goose step under a totalitarian government.

We may well pause and note the following from a western newspaper:

Who nominated Hitler? Hitler.
Who nominated Mussolini? Mussolini.
Who nominated Stalin? Stalin.
Who nominated Roosevelt? Roosevelt.
Who are we to be bragging about "democracy"?
Who, indeed.

Roosevelt having nominated himself; having called for peacetime conscription; there having surreptitiously been put through Congress a bill giving him power to take over and operate all industrial plants, if the American people grant him a third term, they will find that he has firmly established himself as a dictator and will either continue in office indefinitely or name his successor.

The November election is coming on apace. If we would save our country, no time or effort is to be lost. Arouse your neighbors to the danger.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1940

STATEMENT BY EMIL E. HOLMES AND BILL INTRODUCED BY HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER, OF MINNESOTA

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Emil E. Holmes, national deputy chief of staff, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, and also a bill introduced by me. Mr. Holmes' statement follows:

Few if any of those who argue against the so-called draft bill deny that it is a fair system, that it is in reality a selective service; also, it is a rare thing to find anyone who will today deny the need for national defense.

The only reason worthy of consideration is against the establishing of a professional military system. This, however, can very easily be avoided through the adoption of such legislation as H. R. 10113, a copy of which follows:

"A bill (H. R. 10113) to establish as a part of the military reserves of the United States a Home Defense Organized Reserve for local home defense against present-day foreign military methods and "fifth column" infiltration and sabotage

"Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the National Defense Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

" 'SECTION 1. That the Army of the United States shall consist of the Regular Army, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Organized Reserves, the Enlisted Reserve Corps, and the Home Defense Organized Reserve.'

"SEC. 2. Section 55 of the National Defense Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

" 'SEC. 55d. Home Defense Organized Reserve—Veterans shall be given preference: (1) The President is authorized and directed to establish a Home Defense Organized Reserve, which shall consist of such number of officers and men (not exceeding 1,000,000) over the age of 36 years voluntarily enlisting therein as its duties may require. The President may also assign officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army for duty with or for training of the Home Defense Organized Reserve.

" '(2) In order to increase efficiency and to conserve time and save expense for the training of individuals, officials charged with the duty of determining who shall be selected to serve in the home-reserve units, in case there are more volunteers than there are positions to be filled in any area, shall give preference to veterans with previous military service.

" '(3) All policies affecting the organization, distribution, appointment, and promotion in, training of, assignment to, and discharge from the Home Defense Organized Reserve shall be prepared by committees of appropriate branches or divisions of the War Department General Staff, to which shall be added the necessary number of officers from the Home Defense Organized Reserve.

" 'SEC. 55e. Organization of Home Defense Organized Reserve: (1) The Home Defense Organized Reserve shall have corps areas coextensive with the corps areas of the Regular Army. The War Department General Staff shall assign officers from the personnel of the Home Defense Organized Reserve to assist in such command and to establish and maintain liaison within the corps area.

" '(2) In each home-defense department there shall be such local home-defense districts as the War Department General Staff deems the duties of the Home Defense Organized Reserve in such department require. In each such district there shall be a home-defense unit composed of such number of officers and men voluntarily enlisting therein, organized in such manner, as the War Department General Staff deems necessary.

" 'SEC. 55f. Duties of Home Defense Organized Reserve: The Home Defense Organized Reserve shall, under the direction of the War Department through the organization herein provided for—

"'(1) Become fully informed of all strategic points within their respective home-defense districts, such as oil and gas supplies, waterworks, manfacturing establishments, bridges, docks, airports, tunnels, and be prepared to protect and defend such points from sabotage and enemy infiltration in time of national emergency;

"'(2) Become fully informed of all roads, trails, railroads, and other lines of communication within their respective home-defense districts;

"'(3) Become fully informed of the topography of their respective home-defense districts together with tne significance thereof in relation to military tactics;

"'(4) Provide for and assist in the hospitalization and evacuation of civilian population in their respective home-defense districts in time of national emergency;

"'(5) Cooperate with the Intelligence Section of the Regular Army.

"'(6) Train and arm a sufficient force to act in emergency to defend their respective home-defense districts against any preliminary enemy activity; and

"'(7) Perform such other duties in connection with home defense and to cooperate with the Regular Army with such information with respect to their respective home-defense districts as the War Department may prescribe.

"'SEC. 55g. Active service of Home Defense Organized Reserve: Members of the Home Defense Organized Reserve may be called to active service only in time of national emergency declared by Congress. While on active service, the Hcuse Defense Organized Reserve shall receive the same pay and allowances as personnel of equal rank in the Regular Army.

"'SEC. 55h. Surplus Army equipment: The Secretary of War is authorized to furnish the local Home Defense Organized Reserve units with such surplus rifles (together with ammunition therefor), equipment, matériel, etc., as may be required for the training, drilling, and use of such units, and as may be required by their duties.

"'SEC. 55i. Pensions, bounties, bonuses, etc.: No member of the Home Defense Organized Reserve shall by reason of service therein be denied or deprived of any pension, bounty, bonus, gratuity, or hospitalization to which he is now or may hereafter be entitled under present laws by reason of service under this act.'"

This bill would give us a large and highly trained army without delay, and that would within a less period and with less expense train the younger needed millions for future defense armies. Col. William Donovan, World War commander of the fighting Sixty-ninth, offers some expert opinion on this and his views are to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of April 22, 1940, inserted there by Congressman JOHN G. ALEXANDER.

May I urge those who are opposed to the building of a permanent military system to cooperate in putting this idea before the citizens of this Nation? May I urge every Member of Congress to read it and, if opposed, to debate it before the people of their district?

It is my contention that we who fought the past battles of this Nation are entitled to a hearing on this, and that our testimony supported by facts is preferable to schoolboy opinions.

Compulsory Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. FLAHERTY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON POST

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from a recent issue of the Boston Post:

DRAFT DEBATE

Some formidable opposition is developing to the proposed Compulsory Service Act in Congress.

This, however, is not expected to block the passage of the bill. A substantial majority in both the Senate and the House has been unofficially polled and is in favor of the bill in its present form.

Because of its novelty in our American system of life and because it has no precedent in times of peace, a debate of far-reaching proportions is in the offing.

Many people throughout the country have been jarred because the bill seems to interfere with our way of life.

Many organizations, favoring the liberal mode of living and opposing any interference by the Government in any of the normal activities of our citizens, are getting very busy in opposing the draft bill.

But the public seems to understand better than many of its representatives and better than many peace and liberal organizations that the broad implication of the Burke-Wadsworth bill is to insure continuation of our way of life in the midst of what is really a world revolution.

Any complacency which we might have that the evils besetting men in other lands will never reach us here is chimerical.

Complacency is, in these hours, a moral dry rot.

A writer who recently returned from Europe after a tour of France, England, and the Low Countries before and after the German continental successes, wrote that she was much impressed with the fact that the only people in high positions that realized what was going on appeared to be the American military attachés.

The complacency of the French and British was overwhelming.

At the very hour when Chamberlain exulted that "Hitler missed the bus" and Churchill declared that the Norwegian invasion was a mistake comparable to that of Napoleon in Spain, these officers, to their credit, declared that they could see no reason for optimism.

Something of their cynicism regarding the ability of the English and the French to withstand the Germans is present in the average American mind.

While great writers and public persons here have continually sneered at Hitler and his army, the public generally has not underestimated the destructive power of the man and his followers.

To combat this power, it is the work of wisdom to prepare for any eventuality in a military way.

It has been clearly shown that we cannot get voluntary enlistments fast enough to fill our Army even to maximum peace strength.

But we cannot let our country and its institutions go to pieces because of this factor.

Thus, the draft debate this week should not be extended for personal or political reasons.

Reply to Judge Greenspan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in the July 7 issue of the New York Enquirer appeared an article by Judge Benjamin E. Greenspan, in which he deplores the fact that I informed one of our Intelligence Departments that the communistic Jew Hefter was organizing an army of 100,000 men to fight somewhere in the United States. That report the jurist should know was in the line of duty and in conformity with my oath of office as an officer and as a Member of Congress.

In the article the distinguished jurist says, "The Jews cannot organize anything." To this statement I can only reply that the judge is wrong, for the Jews have organized themselves out of nearly every country in which they have found a home and will, if they persist in their present tactics of boycott and election meddling, organize themselves out of the United States.

Is it just for the Jews to use their own press, the nationally controlled press, and their own hired defamers to vilify and slander every American citizen who believes in and upholds constitutional government because such person cannot see eye to eye with the Jews? Is it just for the Jewish defamer, Mr. Winchell, who walks through the gutters before he broadcasts his vile accusations, in order to advertise articles manufactured by his employers? Is it fair to those who are attacked by him not to have an opportunity of replying to this defamer of the air channels, who, like the rest, engages in boycott and then brags about it when he complimented people in various States last Sunday for having defeated those in election that he thought should not be elected? I wonder if the real American people appreciate this compliment by this character assassin who, like a hyena, shelters himself under the protection of his employer to attack in the dark those who cannot reply to him, because of boycott by the press and broadcasting stations which do not allow those attacked by him to reply.

The boycott is an oriental and Jewish weapon which should now be employed against its proponents, so that they may stew in their own juice. The first place to begin that boycott is in denial of entrance into the United States.

Judge Greenspan is wrong when he says that the Jews cannot organize, for they have over 200 national organizations, of which over 190 are located in New York City. They have over 300 State organizations and many subdivisions within the States. The national organization issues 154 publications, which with 180 Jewish publications appearing in the United States makes a total of 334. The Jews have 557 newspapers published in foreign languages, and the publication society, according to the Jewish Year Book, numbers over 9,300 people. These are just a few organizations, for there are many more. In addition to these, the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League numbered over 700 organizations in 1939, and these organizations are Jewish except for the framing. Their stock in trade is to promote boycott and hatreds toward any and all who do not join them in their league of hate. This league, according to its own statement, is served by an organized detective service that was instrumental in building the case against the Christian Front. It has a bureau of statistics and a bureau of propaganda analysis. It has a defamation service that is well versed in character destruction, in the best and well-organized Jewish manner. This same league pictures in its own magazines various Christians as "Apes of Wrath."

The Jews are well represented in the three branches of the Federal Government, and particularly in the Justice and Intelligence Departments. There is not one Federal Department in which the Jews are not well organized and hold key positions. I, therefore, wonder why this most distinguished jurist comes out in the press to attack me and, in addition to that, announced to the public that the Jews cannot organize anything. The Jews are so well organized that they do not appear in the list as operating farms or engaged in farm labor. They do not appear in the ranks of hard labor. As a matter of fact, I have not seen any but Negroes and Gentiles on Government projects here in Washington. They do not appear among those who are engaged in the various crafts and in dangerous occupations, and their names do not appear in the list of those who are working in coal mines, copper mines, or similar hazardous occupations and trades. They are so well organized that I have not seen any one of them in the ranks of the unemployed, which speaks well for their organizing ability. There are very few Jews in the enlisted personnel of the Army or Navy, and I have never seen any one as a sailor in the merchant marine. They are, however, as we well know, conspicuous as organizers in radical and communistic labor movements, movements in which they have been engaged in the United States for over 20 years.

I, therefore, repeat and ask the distinguished jurist what he means when he says that the Jews cannot organize? The Jews organized the revolution in Russia, which was financed by money that came from Wall Street; and they have organized the gosplan of Soviet Russia, the political economic plan or PEP in Great Britain, the economie dirigee in France, and the New Deal in the United States. It is under their supervision that we have our trade pacts and trade treaties and the asinine and stupid policies of Secretary Wallace. No one realizes this better than the Members of Congress, as they observe one Jew after another appearing to testify before the various congressional committees on Government organization.

When the judge insinuates that I am anti-Semitic, he knows that that statement is false, and he knows that he could not substantiate his statement in any gentile court, or even in the Beth Din, even if the rabbis were just. The judge then makes this most astounding statement:

> If such [a Jewish army] is being formed, I'd say the movement is admirable, if it is for the purpose of defense of the United States, and I think that Congressman THORKELSON is trying to misinterpret the movement.

To this I can only say that I am not misrepresenting the movement, for such army exists in fact, if one is to believe pictures or newspapers.

Mr. Hefter claims to be a veteran of four wars. In what armies did he serve? Not in the Imperial Russian Army; not in the Imperial German, Austrian, or Hungarian armies, but he served instead in the revolutionary army under Lenin, Trotsky, and Bela Kun. He is now engaged in organizing and training another army—for what? Another revolutionary army, no doubt, to participate in an attempt toward the same overthrow of government that was so successfully accomplished by those under whom he served. However, he should not be allowed to organize a Jewish or any other army, for that right is even denied to patriotic law-abiding American citizens.

The Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League even howled because the Christian Front had 17 obsolete .22-caliber rifles; but this Jewish army, according to the pictures, is well equipped with modern weapons for field service. What is it all about? The Judge ridiculed the idea of conspiracy in this organization, but he knows as well as I that this army is not organized for the welfare of the United States, and that should be clearly evident to anyone with just 1 ounce of gray matter.

The judge then makes this most extraordinary statement:

> I imagine that if Ireland were attacked, the Irish would conspire to defend it.

What interpretation is to be taken from this statement? Naturally the Irish would defend Ireland, but does Judge Greenspan infer that the United States is in the future to be protected by the Jews instead of the United States Army and Navy? And are we now supposed to be a Jewish state? If one is to believe his remarks and their inferences, we cannot fail to interpret them with a certain amount of apprehension, for it certainly appears that the distinguished jurist believes that the Jews are now actually in control of the United States.

The judge deplores my statement, and I can well understand his anxiety, for I have stood in support of the Constitution as it was given to us by the founders of this great and glorious country. In addition to that, I have opposed those who are engaged in misinterpretation or sabotage of the document, and in the conversion of our Government into what Judge Greenspan now seems to believe it is, a Jewish state. I deplore that the judge said I was anti-Semitic, when the fact is that I am not even anti-Jewish. I am not concerned about Semitics, but I do feel sorry for those Jews who are first Americans and who may become innocent sufferers for the act of "a few Godless Jews." It certainly should make our own people think, could they only realize that the word "anti" is not employed by anyone except the Jew. What a strange country we would have, and in what a mess we would be, if we were composed of a nation of anti-Danish, anti-Dutch, anti-Swedish, anti-English, anti-Irish, and so on, ad infinitum. What would it be if all of us indulged in designating those who disagree with us as "anti" to our own ancestral race, and in such designation expect all others to join in their suppression? It is this that the Jews expect every American to do when he designates those who disagree with him as anti-Semitics. The term is not even correct, because he should call them "anti-Jews" if they are actually opposed to the Jew, but certainly not if they speak in defense of the Constitution and our own country.

I furthermore deplore that the Jewish communistic press and the Jewish-controlled national press have done their best to villify and libel me since May 1, 1930. I deplore the fact that the Jews have hired unprincipled gentiles to disseminate false information and to engage in a whispering campaign of slander against me in my own State. I deplore the fact that the Daily Worker, the New Leader, the Jewish Examiner, the Jewish Transcript, Equality, the New Republic, and Time have villified and slandered me because I have spoken the truth. I also regret that the Montana Cut Bank Pioneer Press, and another defamatory sheet, the Great Falls Tribune, have seen fit to engage in the same libellous accusations which they could not substantiate, should I insist that they do so. I deplore the fact that the Jewish press has attacked me and other Christians, and I now deplore the fact that Judge Greenspan has stultified himself and his office in joining my defamers in libellous accusation, that neither he nor anyone else can substantiate in any American court.

It must, however, be understood that when I discuss the international Jew, I do not include those who believe in the fundamental principles of this Republic as set forth in the Constitution of the United States, for they are loyal American citizens and considered as such by myself and all other Americans.

ARTICLE BY ASSEMBLYMAN JACK B. TENNEY, OF INGLEWOOD, CALIF.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Assemblyman Jack B. Tenney, published in the Inglewood (Calif.) Daily News of July 8, 1940:

[From the Inglewood (Calif.) Daily News of July 8, 1940]

TENNEY EXPOSES "FRONT" ORGANIZATIONS IN FIGHT TO RID STATE OF "ISMS"

Assemblyman Jack B. Henney, of Inglewood, arch foe of the "isms" which threaten America, and who has been doing outstanding work as a member of the Yorty committee investigating radicalism in this State, delivered the following radio address over KMTR last Friday evening, under the auspices of the American Federation of Labor:

"I wish to speak to you tonight concerning one of communism's great 'front' organizations in the field of American labor—the so-called Labor's Non-Partisan League. I want to emphasize by way of preface that the many fine American men and women of organized labor have been deceived into supporting this front organization, and I want to say that my remarks are not in any way a reflection upon the rank and file of patriotic citizens who have unwittingly and innocently given strength and prestige to this Stalin-dominated Trojan horse. The truth is now known, however, and there will be little excuse for any patriotic member of American labor to continue to support this un-American organization in the future.

LABOR OPPOSES DICTATORS

"Totalitarianism cannot flourish if democratic labor organizations are permitted to exist. Totalitarian Russia was and is no exception. One of the first official acts of the Soviet gangsters under the dictatorship of the proletariat was the abolition of Russia's trade-union movement. Collective bargaining, like free speech and the right of free assembly, become a capital offense. To strike and to picket become acts of treason and were designated counterrevolutionary. Firing squads took the place of labor injunctions, while brutal regimentation was substituted for collective bargaining. The despotic czars of the old Russia are remembered as industrial sentimentalists compared to the bloodstained masters now in the throne room of the Kremlin. When futile resistance was broken by the summary execution of several thousand disillusioned trade-unionists and their leaders, a new and terrifying state feudalism was born, and Russia's labor movement had perished.

"The Third International—known to the blood-stained monsters of the Kremlin as the Comintern—spawned the Red Trade Union International in 1919. This organization is known among these same 'comrades' as the Profintern, and it was organized and first headed by Comrade Losovsky. (Incidentally, textbooks by this same Comrade Losovsky on trade-unions and their use by Communists as a smoke screen to the revolution are used today in the Communist trade-union schools throughout the county of Los Angeles.) The expressed aim of the Red Trade Union International was to sabotage and destroy 'reformist unions' everywhere, and particularly the American Federation of Labor in the United States.

"Comrade W. Z. Foster organized the Trade Union Educational League in the United States in 1922, acting under orders handed down at the First World Congress of the Profintern, held that year in Moscow. Foster, by the way, testified before a congressional investigating committee that Soviet Russia was the fatherland of all Communists and workers and that the 'red' flag was the symbol to which all Communists owed allegiance. The purpose of the Trade Union Educational League was to attack the unions of the American Federation of Labor by 'boring from within'—to sabotage and wreck these great democratic associations of American labor. The patriotic rank-and-file members and the alert leadership of the American Federation of Labor was completely successful in blocking the infiltration attempts of these 'red' termites. But Communists do not despair. A new organization was set up by Foster which was named the Trade Union Unity League—deceiving and misleading—but strangely reminiscent of today's Labor's Non-Partisan League.

"FRONT" ORGANIZATIONS

"This new 'front' organization, the Trade Union Unity League, became the first dual union movement set up by the Communists to oppose the American Federation of Labor. Its un-American and revolutionary character was little disguised and undenied. It gave birth to certain incipient industrial unions, and its chief activity was the calling and waging of strikes for any reason or no reason at all.

MOSCOW GANGSTERS

"The Moscow gangsters, despairing of capturing the A. F. of L., turned its agents to the possibilities presented by the C. I. O., which came into being in 1935. Stalin's stooges made considerable headway in the inexperienced and loosely organized unions that began to mushroom into existence under the leadership and guidance of John L. Lewis.

"In 1935 'Comrade' Georgi Dimitrov distinguished the Seventh World Congress of the Hammer and Sickle by achieving a 'new high' in treachery and deceit—his diabolical and pernicious adaption of the Trojan horse and the 'united front' tactics. Foreign agents eagerly took up the new Soviet treachery in the United States and it was not long until patriotic American men and women, deceived and betrayed, were marching shoulder to shoulder with the sneering stooges of totalitarian Russia.

UNITED FRONT TACTIC

"Then came the classic example of the 'united front' tactic in the American labor movement—Labor's Non-Partisan League. Baited with high-sounding objectives and window-dressed with unsuspecting respectability, this new machine of Communist dishonesty rolled forward. It is significant to note that although John L. Lewis was the national chairman of this new 'front' organization, his name was omitted from most of the letterheads for the express purpose of ensnaring and capturing A. F. of L. support. Only the name of E. L. Oliver appeared with the title of executive vice president.

"The Communist Party began its new, and probably its most effective, drive for the capture of California labor in 1937. The general plan of the "red" high command was to fuse Railway Brotherhoods, the C. I. O., and the A. F. of L. into Labor's Non-Partisan League and thus to become the spokesman and leader of all labor groups. Secret control of the league was assured at the start. Other 'front' organizations were instructed to help build the league and to give it prestige and political power. The wresting of all leadership from the A. F. of L. were immediate objectives.

BROWDER SPOUTS

"Earl Browder emphasized the importance of the league in a party periodical called the Communist in December 1937. William Schneidermann, the California State secretary of the Communist Party, who has just had his citizenship papers canceled, wrote about the league in the December 22 issue of the Western Worker, the predecessor of the current Communist daily, the People's World. So that there will be no doubt of the Communist interest in Labor's Non-Partisan League, I quote from the California Party Guide for January 1938, published at 121 Haight Street in San Francisco, at page 7, under the title 'L. N. P. L.':

" 'It is essential that the utmost attention be given to help build Labor's Non-Partisan League in every important industrial center of California and to win the affiliation of unions, both C. I. O. and A. F. of L., and railway brotherhoods, with special concentration upon A. F. of L. unions, in every section of the State.'

"This quotation from the confidential guide of the Communist Party can leave no doubt of the interest in, and certain control of, Labor's Non-Partisan League. Although many patriotic, well-meaning union men and women have been deceived by this 'front' organization in the past, the revelations recently disclosed by the assembly investigating committee headed by Assemblyman Sam Yorty, of which I am a member, leaves little excuse for continued affiliation. It is well known now, that Don Healey, Los Angeles County Secretary of Labor's Non-Partisan League was formerly a registered Communist in this county and evidence before our committee shows his continuation as a Communist in the so-called Communist Enlarged Trade Union Commission. Information in the hands of the Yorty assembly investigating committee reveals the Communist Party secret affiliations of many other leaders in Labor's Non-Partisan League. One of the leading lights, active in labor and politics, is known to the comrades under the alias of Harold Stark, and this individual is honored by his Stalin superiors with the title of educational director of the Communist Party schools.

OLIVER WRITES

"If further evidence were needed, it came this week in the form of a communication addressed to me from E. L. Oliver, executive vice president of Labor's Non-Partisan League. Mr. Oliver enclosed a copy of a letter he wrote to John L. Lewis under date of June 21, 1940. He tells Mr. Lewis in part:

" 'Events of the past 10 days have made it clear to me that I cannot conscientiously continue in the position of executive vice president of Labor's Non-Partisan League. It is with sincere regret that I am therefore resigning that position, effective immediately.'

"Mr. Oliver says further to Mr. Lewis:

" 'The infinitesimal minority within the league opposing the reelection of President Roosevelt is, in my judgment, predominantly composed of individuals affiliated with or following the leadership of organizations controlled from outside of the United States, whose policies are fixed without reference to the needs of American labor.'

"No one can be left in doubt as to what Mr. Oliver means in his letter of resignation. Undoubtedly Mr. Oliver feels like Mr. David Lasser felt when the latter gentleman resigned as national president of the Communist-controlled Workers Alliance. Commenting on his resignation Mr. Lasser said:

" '* * * It was because I could no longer stomach the rule-or-ruin tactics by the Communist leadership that I was forced to resign and let you know the facts.'

"Real Americans who have heretofore been deceived by these un-American 'front' organizations controlled by forces from outside the United States are following the examples set by David Lasser, of the Workers Alliance, and Mr. Oliver, of Labor's Non-Partisan League.

"Patriotic citizens within the ranks of organized labor, as well as patriotic citizens everywhere, have a twofold duty before them. One is to purge all foreign-spawned termites from every American organization and the other is to end unemployment in the United States. I will conclude by quoting the last paragraph of the report of the assembly investigating committee, heretofore referred to:

" 'Most important of all, a sound, constructive program of reemployment must be determined upon and executed through the cooperation of government, business, and labor. This is a necessary defense measure. Subversive groups feed the fires of discontent created by economic break-down. Their lying propaganda and promises are doubled in effectiveness during periods of economic uncertainty. The combined intelligence and patriotism of all Americans must cause them to support whatever equitable economic adjustments are necessary to put an end to the scourge of unemployment. Doles are not the answer. Doles and demoralization go hand in hand. The great morale that has always characterized the American people must be safeguarded. The calamity howlers must be met by a deafening roar of American industrial activity.' "

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENT

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from one of my constituents:

RACINE, WIS., July 30, 1940.

Congressman STEPHEN BOLLES,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: There is, or will be, up for consideration before your honorable body the so-called conscription bill as recommended by the President.

I, together with a great many other American citizens, am at a loss to understand the present war hysteria and the unseemly and unreasonable antics on the part of our lawmaking bodies.

We all believe in preparedness, but the idea of appropriating billions that cannot be spent in less than 5 years, when nobody knows what we are preparing against and what kind of weapons will be necessary to combat our so-called future enemies seems supremely ridiculous.

We are appropriating millions for battleships when there is great doubt as to their value in modern warfare. Why not clearly study the situation before going off half-cocked. There is no enemy at our doors, and won't be for several years to come at the earliest. When it does come let us be properly prepared with the right kind of weapons and not find that billions in money and effort have been wasted.

Now comes the conscription bill on top of all the rest of the half-baked provisions for war. What's the idea? Everybody knows that all past methods of military training are obsolete and that the future training will be to handle mechanized units and airplanes.

Where are the implements of war with which to train the boys when you have them in camp?

If it is going to be a matter of drill, you might just as well leave them home and let them drill in some alley with broomsticks in their spare time.

To take the boys away from their work or professions for a whole year and have them spend it uselessly in some camp without any definite program seems to me the height of foolishness.

I am a widow with one son 24 years of age. I take a back seat for no one when it is a matter of sacrificing for my country when in danger, but I take decided exception to having my boy's future success interfered with by spending a year in useless drill.

Respectfully,

JO WIECHERS.

The Third-Term Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA

LETTER BY SEDGWICK KISTLER TO LOCK HAVEN (PA.) EXPRESS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial written by Sedgwick Kistler for the Lock Haven (Pa.) Express of July 30, 1940:

[From the Lock Haven (Pa.) Express of July 30, 1940]

VIEWS THIRD TERM AS VITAL ISSUE IN PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

The EXPRESS.

SIR: You contend editorially, "now that Roosevelt is running, the third-term issue is out of date," and our acceptance of that contention is a test of our "national unity." Hitler has completely developed that sort of philosophy; Germans must vote for him only in order to show their national unity. If they don't—and are found out—they are sent to concentration camps.

The third term has been an issue in this Nation since Washington was the first President. Washington refused a third term, though it was offered him without a contest. Jefferson did likewise, and no two men in our Nation's history did more than those two great Presidents to create and establish our democratic form of government. They possessed vision and wisdom and realized the future dangers that would beset democratic government, believing the greatest danger would be any President's long-continued period in an office whose powers so readily lend themselves to the erection of a dictatorship and the consequent destruction of democracy. Such was the reason which prompted Washington and Jefferson to refuse a third term, and they in their times were as indispensable to the security and progress of the Nation and its form of government as any President ever will be.

Washington set a precedent about the third term; Roosevelt would break that precedent for the sake of his New Deal and New Dealers and in so doing would take our Government a long step in the direction of dictatorship, which historically and inevitably results from every long-continued period of great power in government by any individual.

It is a well-known condition here that a president has powerful means through his control of political office holders and beneficiaries of reelecting himself. (This condition prompts the popular belief in a single 6-year term for our Presidents.) To use that control for his one reelection has been excused by the people but to use that control again and again for reelection after reelection is not in accord with the principles of the democratic form of government nor with our traditions.

To put his plea for his reelection to 12 years in office, as Roosevelt does, on the demand he and he alone must carry on the program he began 8 years ago is to put him and his program in the same category with Stalin and his 5-year programs, Hitler and his 6 years, Mussolini with 10 years. Now Roosevelt wants 12 years—the first 12 years. Who of the four of them will say "I have finished"? Not one, for all are obsessed with the delusion they and they alone can save their countries, their satellites, themselves, and their works.

Through a combination of maneuvers, some ignoble, Roosevelt gained control of the National Democratic Party exactly as Hitler gained control of what once was the national democratic party in Germany. Today both of those democratic parties, as exemplified by Roosevelt here and Hitler over there, have no resemblance in principles or purpose to their original ones. The real Democrats at the recent Chicago convention were put in the "dog house," which is common knowledge; the real democrats in Germany have been put into concentration camps, also common knowledge. Dictatorship has its degrees but under it what begins with a dog house can easily grow into a concentration camp.

Too many of us close our eyes, stick our heads in the sand and believe "it cannot happen here," as if human nature is different on different sides of an ocean. Dictatorships have come to one nation after another under different names but all of them with much the same line of procedure and all to end with the same effect, for in every one of them the result has been the loss of the freedom of the individual. It seems human weakness to put little value on what we have and great value on what we do not have; we risk our individual freedom for the promise of better material conditions. The end is the loss of both freedom and better conditions, as all existing dictatorships conclusively prove.

Why talk about dictatorship over here? One move after another, one urge after another, one purge after another here in recent years is of the exact nature if not the full degree of those in Europe. And now, in Roosevelt's third-term demand, we have here in degree as well as in nature the essence of complete dictatorship which is the continuance of an individual's political control of the people, the consequent death of self-government, and ending in the loss of the freedom of the people.

Roosevelt wants a third term. He schemed it that way, against all the fundamental principles and precedents of our democratic Government. He undermined and overpowered a great political party with a "fifth column" of new dealers. His control of his recent renomination was absolute and arbitrary and he is now free to do everything he wishes to the end of reelecting himself President, continuing his power, and dictating the governmental policy of the Nation.

If there is any issue in this country today between dictatorial control of our Government and democratic control of our Government then certainly the third term is an issue in the coming election.

SEDGWICK KISTLER.

HON. EWING THOMASON

STATEMENT OF HON. HENRY L. STIMSON BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Hon. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, before the House Committee on Military Affairs:

TEXT OF STIMSON'S STATEMENT ON DRAFT—SECRETARY OF WAR URGES CONSCRIPTION BEFORE HOUSE UNIT

You, gentlemen, are the trustees of the security of the United States. One of the main purposes of our Constitution is to provide for the common defense. Under that Constitution the power to raise and support armies was specifically given to the Congress. You, gentlemen, are the members of the committee which was created to guide the House of Representatives in the performance of its duties in that matter of raising and supporting armies. Thus in that matter you are in very special sense, the trustees for the people of the United States.

Now what are the rules which in ordinary life guide a trustee in the performance of his duties?

First and foremost it his duty to follow the lessons of experience. It is his duty to avoid methods which have been shown to be ineffective and futile; which have not only been futile but have been breeders of evils and dangers. It is his duty, in other words, to play safe with the great trust which has been confided to him.

NO DOUBT AS TO METHOD

When we apply these simple and well-known fiduciary rules to the problem of this bill which is before you now, it seems to me that there can be no doubt or question as to the method to follow. If there is any lesson that has been thoroughly proved by history throughout the life of our Nation, it is that the only safe and effective way to meet a great war emergency is by the timely creation of a selective compulsory system for raising our armies. The other system, the system of volunteering, has been tried again and again, and in every serious war, as well as in some wars which were not serious, it has proved a costly failure. Our Government tried it in the Revolution. Within 2 years the great States of Virginia and Massachusetts were forced to resort to the draft and even then the total number of men serving under arms in the American armies declined from some 79,000 men in 1776 to less than 30,000 men in 1781. In the Civil War both sides began with volunteers and both sides eventually were compelled to resort to the draft. We tried it in the Spanish War, and although the number of men required was extremely small in comparison to our population, even that small number was never fully enlisted.

CITES WORLD WAR SUCCESS

Finally, in the Great War, our Government began with a carefully devised selective and compulsory system, and the largest armies ever used in our history were raised with an enthusiasm which was magnificent, and with a minimum of disturbance to our national and industrial life.

The experience of Great Britain has been similar to ours. She had the same prejudice as we did against conscription and in favor of the voluntary system. In both the Great War and on the approach of the present war, she delayed in instituting a compulsory system, with the result, in both cases, that there was caused enormous loss and confusion, and now possibly eventual disaster. In all the other nations of Europe, from peace-loving Switzerland to the totalitarian states, the compulsory system is recognized as the only effective method by which a nation can organize its military strength.

Thus, from the standpoint of the lessons of human experience, there can be no question between the two methods; there can be no question that one has regularly proved a costly failure, while the other is now universally recognized as the only system which is effective.

ONLY EFFICIENT SYSTEM

In the next place, from the standpoint of principle, the selective compulsory system is the only one which is fair; the only system which distributes the primary duty of national defense upon every citizen and which distributes that duty so that each man may serve in the capacity where he will be most effective. It is also the only system which is appropriate to a democracy; which recognizes that, in a country where all citizens have the right to participate in choosing their own government, they are also obligated to serve and defend that government in case of the peril of war. It would be just as unfair to leave to the whim of the individual the question of whether or not he will render service to his government in time of war as it would be to leave to the whim of the individual the question of whether or not he would pay taxes for the support of that government.

Thirdly, the selective compulsory system is the only efficient system in the great task of avoiding, so far as possible, the disruption of the Nation's normal life. The voluntary system is not only inadequate to raise modern armies but it is disruptive of industry and of agriculture and of all the sciences and specialties upon which a nation must depend in time of war. All those activities, under a voluntary system, are liable to be disrupted by the rush of patriotic citizens to enlist and fight when they might be more useful elsewhere.

MINIMUM OF DISLOCATION

On the other hand, the compulsory system, when carefully administered, as it was during the Great War, by local boards which take into account not only the battle needs of the country but also its needs of supplies and armaments, will carry the country through the strain of war with the minimum of dislocation. It will not only do that but it will carry it through with the minimum of injustice to the individual, because those boards take into account the situation of each man in respect to his occupation, his family duties and his health.

In all these ways the selective compulsory system is the closest approximation to both efficiency and justice which the experience of this country has yet evolved.

But some of the opponents of compulsory service say that it is a war measure and therefore that we should not adopt it until war has actually arrived. That is exactly what people in Great Britain said to Winston Churchill for 4 years, when he was steadily preaching that war was coming and that Britain should immediately prepare herself for it. When we look at Great Britain today, are we inclined to take the risk of a similar delay? The successive experiences of Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, and Britain, teach the lesson of the danger of not preparing before war actually arrives.

FAR GREATER PERIL NOW

We don't have to look abroad for an answer to this question. We only have to contrast the position in which we ourselves stand today with the position in which we stood in 1917 when we adopted the Selective Act of 1917. I ask you in all fairness, are we not today confronting a far greater peril than we did in June 1917? In 1917 we were protected by the unbroken line of the Allies in France and by the unshaken control of the sea by those Allies. Today there is no line in France, and the control of the sea by the British Fleet is in jeopardy. Today we are face to face with a potential enemy which not only has been conscripting and training its own forces for the past 6 years but which today is putting conscription into effect upon its victims in Poland and France, and in Norway, Denmark, and Holland, in order that its own war supplies may be more ample.

We have been accustomed to think of our Navy and the seas which surround our country as constituting a line of defense so strong that a powerful Army was unnecessary. But today the great shipbuilding industries of Norway and Holland have passed into German hands. The fleet of Italy and her shipbuilding capacity are subject to German disposition. A prudent trustee must take into consideration the possibility that in another 30 days Great Britain herself may be conquered and her shipyards pass under German control. Many of the war vessels of France have already come under the control of Germany, and the same thing may occur in regard to the great fleet of Great Britain.

ARMS NO GOOD WITHOUT MEN

In the Pacific Ocean the powerful fleet of Japan is owned by a power acting in close sympathy with Germany and Italy. Under these circumstances it seems to me very clear that we must revise our former conception of the strength of our first line of defense.

If all of these contingencies which now confront us should be resolved in Germany's favor, she would at once control a naval power which would outrank us in all classes of fighting craft. What is worse, she would outrank us in shipbuilding capacity in a ratio of at least 6 to 1. In the prospect of such a possibility, I suggest to you in all earnestness that it is your duty as trustees to take at once those measures for the security of the United States which have behind them those reasons of experience, of efficiency, of justice, and of fairness which I have just recited.

The Congress has already wisely recognized what a long time it takes to secure a modern armament and has already made large appropriations for that purpose. It would be well to recognize also that it takes a long time to secure and train the men to use such arms, and that the arms are of little use without the men.

War Department Designates Strategic Areas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

MEMORANDUM FROM COL. H. K. RUTHERFORD, ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES ARMY

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, for the information of my colleagues and in the interest of an adequate national defense, the following memorandum received this date from Col. H. K. Rutherford, Ordnance Department, Director of Planning Branch, United States Army, defines the areas regarded by the War Department as most suitable for the locating of new munitions plants:

It was recognized that one of the important factors to be considered in locating new munitions plants would be placing them in the interior of the country so as to minimize the hazard of attack from the air. For this reason the War Department decided that such plants should be placed within an area from 200 to 250 miles inside the geographic boundaries of the United States. In exceptional cases, however, where the necessities of the situation may make it imperative, exceptions could be made to this boundary line, but each exception would be carefully considered on its merits.

Within the general area so defined a tentative subdivision was made into five areas, numbered A, B, C, D, and E. These subdivisions were made roughly on the bases of the character of the industries and resources predominant in the various areas. The new plants to be established would be distributed as equitably as practicable over the five areas. This distribution would be accomplished in the several areas after due consideration to the munitions industries already in the area or in contiguous areas, the adaptability of the area to particular type of munitions manufacture, and the effectiveness with which the particular location would contribute to the execution of the defense program. Many detailed studies of the factors involved will, of course, have to be made before particular sites can be selected.

The areas tentatively selected are outlined roughly below. It is not intended that these areas as defined shall be rigidly adhered to, since the primary purpose of designating them is simply as a preliminary step in distributing the new munitions plants as equitably and safely as practicable. It is expected that the new plants to be erected would be distributed among the five areas, and probably, too, additional areas would be established later so that each unit would be reasonably well integrated within itself, and so that if any one area were damaged or lost remaining areas would continue to supply the essential requirements under the defense program.

Area "A" includes, roughly, northern Indiana, northern Illinois, southern Wisconsin and Minnesota, and Iowa, and thence westward.

Area "B" includes Ohio, southwestern Pennsylvania, West Virginia, the western portion of Virginia, and eastern Kentucky.

Area "C" includes southern Indiana and Illinois, western Kentucky, Missouri, eastern Kansas, and thence westward.

Area "D" includes western North Carolina, northern Georgia and Alabama, and the eastern part of Tennessee.

Area "E" includes the western part of Tennessee, northern Mississippi, Arkansas, northern Louisiana and Texas, Oklahoma, and westward.

2. Trusting that this gives you the information desired, I remain,

Cordially yours,

H. K. RUTHERFORD,

Colonel, Ordnance Department, Director, Planning Branch.

Vocational Educational Training by the Federal Bureau of Education and the National Youth Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. BUELL SNYDER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

STATEMENT PREPARED BY J. W. STUDEBAKER, COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION, AND AUBREY WILLIAMS, NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of some of my friends and colleagues, I asked the United States Commissioner of Education, Mr. J. W. Studebaker, and the Federal Administrator of National Youth Administration, Mr. Aubrey Williams, to give me a statement as to just how they were going to coordinate their work in carrying out a program that would be efficient and at the same time not overlap in personnel or expenditures. They have submitted to me such a statement, and I hereby include the same.

The sole purpose of the United States Office of Education is to promote the cause of education throughout the country and thus to aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of efficient school systems,[1] including cooperation with the States in the promotion of vocational education.[2] In securing the establishment of policies and in the operation of procedures to achieve this purpose, the Office necessarily works regularly and officially with and through State departments of education, institutions of higher learning, and local school systems. In general, its methods involve (1) cooperative relationships with State educational systems and agencies, especially through grants-in-aid of various forms of vocational education and for the operation of land-grant colleges and universities, (2) research and the dissemination of its findings, (3) leadership and clearing-house functions concerning education in general performed through National and State conferences, educational planning, publications, and public addresses, and (4) experimentation and demonstrations to discover more effective educational policies and practices.

Through the years, therefore, the United States Office of Education has naturally and necessarily established its contacts with the schools and colleges in the States. To avoid overlapping and confusion of functions and duplication of effort, and to secure economy and efficiency in the operation of policies requiring Federal-State relationships with the school systems in the States, it is essential that the responsibility for Federal policies designed to stimulate or to support expansions or modifications of educational services to the youth of the country be placed in the United States Office of Education.

The purpose of the National Youth Administration is to furnish employment to needy youth. Incidental to and as a part of such employment there is necessarily an element of training. But the operation of schools and training programs as such is not a function of the National Youth Administration. To several hundred thousand young people in high schools and colleges the employment provided by the National Youth Administration furnishes a means of enabling the students to remain in school or college. For out-of-school young people of the ages 17 to 25 employment will be provided on work projects to enable each person employed to earn a subsistence wage, or about $18 per month. In general, young people employed by the National Youth Administration are expected to work an average of 15 hours a week. The national program is administered by a staff in Washington which operates through State organizations established for the special purpose of administering the program of the National Youth Administration.

Since any sound program for the development of youth should be designed to eliminate idleness among young people, and to substitute therefor the productive use of their time either in full-time productive work or in full-time education, or in a combination of both, it is the general objective of the national program of work and education for youth sponsored by the National Youth Administration and the United States Office of Education, respectively, to engage the time of each young person employed by the National Youth Administration during at least 30 hours each week.

[2] Excerpt from Smith-Hughes Vocational Education Act passed by Congress February 23, 1917.

Briefly, then, the function of the United States Office of Education is to secure the development and operation of educational or training programs for all youth, and the function of the National Youth Administration is to organize and administer programs of work for needy or selected youth.

In view of these clearly defined and mutually exclusive functions of the two agencies, it is agreed that—

1. It is the function of the United States Office of Education to exercise leadership in developing and in administering federally financed programs of education, including emergency-training programs to be conducted cooperatively by the Federal Government, the States, and the local communities, in schools and colleges. The Office, in accordance with its long-time policy, will develop and administer such programs through the established channels of educational administration.

2. It is the function of the National Youth Administration to provide and administer the funds with which to support programs of student work for young people who will be enrolled full time in schools or colleges, and also employment on work projects for other young people, all of whom will be provided with related or necessary instruction under the direction of Federal, State, and local educational authorities.

3. In establishing and carrying forward Federal-State relations while performing the functions as indicated under paragraph 1 above, the United States Office of Education is the Federal agency responsible for dealing directly with State educational systems and institutions.

4. In performing its functions as specified in paragraph 2 above, the Federal Office of the National Youth Administration will be responsible for dealing directly with its authorized agents in the State.

5. In working out policies for the development of their respective programs, neither the United States Office of Education nor the National Youth Administration will seek to secure appropriations with which to support activities in the States which are not strictly in accordance with the respective functions of these agencies as indicated above.

6. It is understood that insofar as the Federal Government participates in the support of educational services in the States for young people employed by the National Youth Administration and involving personnel, supplies, equipment, and other operating costs, such support will be limited to the funds made available to the United States Office of Education and allotted by it to the States.

7. The United States Commissioner of Education and the Federal Administrator of the National Youth Administration assume the responsibility for securing the acceptance of this definition of functions by the officials of State departments of education and the State administrators of the National Youth Administration respectively.

8. In planning projects the State Youth Administrator shall work out jointly with the State department of education the nature of and plan for the work, including the location of the project. The State department of education shall be responsible for developing a program of education suited to the needs of the youth employed on such projects. In any situation in which the State department of education decides that it is not feasible to furnish instruction in addition to that which is incidental to and a part of the work and is given during the work period, the specific situation in question shall be referred to a committee of three persons, selected jointly by the State director of vocational education and the State administrator of the National Youth Administration. This committee shall decide whether such additional instruction is to be provided and whether the State department of education or the National Youth Administration shall provide it.

LETTER FROM ANNA FAY SNOW, OF VERNAL, UTAH

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I received a letter from a little 12-year-old constituent of mine, appended to which was an approval by her mother. In my opinion, it is the most eloquent exhibit of the charity, love, and Christian spirit, which is so much a part of the womanhood of America, that I have received during my tenure of office as a Member of this distinguished body. I would be derelict, as a Member of this House, if I did not put it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that it may be read, I hope, by all Members of Congress and by other American citizens throughout the country.

The little girl who wrote the letter is Anna Fay Snow, of Vernal, Utah. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Snow. They are typical, average American citizens, and she is a typical American schoolgirl. The letter is written in her own simple language and handwriting, and I am sure it contains a genuine expression coming directly from the heart of this fine American girl, so typical, in my opinion, of the average American girl.

VERNAL, UTAH, July 10, 1940.

Mr. ABE MURDOCK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MURDOCK: I heard over the radio that the English people were asking the Americans to take their children into our homes until the war is over. I don't know who to write to unless you could get one for me to let stay with us.

I would like a little girl as near my own age as possible. I am 12 years old this month and have neither brothers nor sisters. My mother and father would like to have a little girl come and stay with us, too. We live on a small farm. We are poor but we have plenty to eat and a good warm house. My daddy and mother are good reliable citizens and say they would treat the little girl the same as they do me. She would not be expected to do any more work than I do, which isn't much. I spend most of my time with my music. I also have bicycles and plenty of room to play in.

So if you know of any little English girls wanting to visit America during the war I wish you would please recommend our family.

Yours truly,

ANNA FAY SNOW.

Father's name: Kenneth Snow.

We would like very much to have a little girl stay with us as a companion to our own.

Mrs. KENNETH SNOW.

HON. JAMES W. WADSWORTH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

LETTER FROM MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM C. RIVERS

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, United States Army, retired:

NEW YORK, July 29, 1940.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WADSWORTH: I have seen no mention of the failure of the volunteer system in our War with Spain in the discussions about the Burke-Wadsworth bill for conscripting men without dependents and who are between the ages of 21 and 35.

Our War with Spain was a generally popular war, but the quota of 275,000 volunteers called for by President McKinley in 1898 was not completely filled. The volunteers were needed to fill the ranks of the National Guard and the Regular Army. The maximum strength of the Regular Army was at that time fixed by law at 25,000. Energetic efforts were made to secure volunteers. Each regiment of the Army was authorized to send out recruiting parties in addition to the efforts of the regular recruiting service.

The declaration of war and the shipment of troops to Europe in 1917 were measures which were generally popular. Considerable numbers of volunteers did come forward. However, many of these men may have been spurred on by the knowledge that the conscription law was soon to be passed.

The public is much in favor of increasing our land and naval forces for defensive purposes at the present time. Yet the fear that we may send soldiers to fight in Europe still seems to be in the minds of many who might volunteer now. Sending our troops overseas would be an unpopular measure. It will be difficult, if not impossible, to fill the ranks of the guard and the Regular Army by the volunteer system at the present time.

I should like to commend the general provisions of the Burke-Wadsworth bill now under consideration. The effectiveness and fairness of the system of selecting men for the Army in the present emergency appear to be more generally recognized throughout the country. Only by selecting men for the Army ranks can we make sure that the men best qualified for manufacturing service are used where they are most needed.

The principal objection in the minds of most persons who are opposed to the present bill is that it provides for conscription in peacetime. It is wise to prepare in peace for war and for emergencies. We are obliged to take certain precautions at once unless we are willing to run the risk of grave national danger in a world already heavily armed. For our country it is peacetime. However, we must all admit that it is a peculiar and unstable sort of peacetime under which we now live.

Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM C. RIVERS,
Major General, United States Army, Retired.

Old-Line Democratic Paper Rejects Third Term and Comes Out for Willkie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE HARRISBURG (PA.) PATRIOT

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, on July 20, 1940, the Harrisburg Patriot, which for many years has been an outstanding Democratic daily in central Pennsylvania, rejected the third-term candidacy of President Roosevelt and announced its support of the Republican nominee, Mr. Wendell Willkie. The Patriot, together with the Evening News, have been under the active management of Vance C. McCormick, of Harrisburg, who was the campaign manager for Woodrow Wilson during the 1916 campaign. Mr. McCormick has held many positions of trust and confidence under the Democratic Party. In the editorial in which the Patriot announced its support of Mr. Willkie, the editor cited 26 New Deal policies which he considered highly objectionable; and then announced that it was fortunate that those Democrats who cherished and believed in the ideals of Thomas Jefferson had the opportunity to vote for a man who believed in those ideals, and whose utterances to date give evidence of sound thinking on economic and other public policies.

The editorial from the Patriot follows:

[From the Harrisburg (Pa.) Patriot of July 20, 1940]

ISSUES WHICH ARE FUNDAMENTAL

The Patriot is sorry it cannot support the Democratic candidate for President this year. Renomination of President Roosevelt breaks the third-term tradition as well as the hearts of millions of Democrats who had hoped the dangerous and uneconomic policies of the New Deal would be repudiated and the party rededicated to its fundamental principles.

This is the worst of all times in American history to shatter a tradition which not only is sound in itself but dear to millions of American citizens. The world is so full of dictatorships that even talk or suspicion of it here, in view of the unprecedented growth of bureaucracy, is not in the public interest.

But serious as is the disregard for the third-term tradition, it is but one of many reasons why this newspaper cannot approve or encourage a perpetuation of the New Deal and its further damage to the Nation's interest. If the New Deal has meant well, it has wrought disastrously. Instead of speeding recovery, recovery has been retarded. The New Deal has not kept its word to abandon social and economic experiments which failed. Instead it has indulged in even more wasteful and unsound programs.

The New Deal has adopted some measures which Jeffersonian Democrats could support, but in number and seriousness these are dwarfed by the undesirable and damaging effects of others. Its most illustrious example of futility is the deplorable fact that after 8 years the number of unemployed remains virtually where it started.

President Roosevelt did an excellent job in restoring order out of widespread panic when he took office in the midst of the depression. That credit is his, and deservedly so. As that first term proceeded many of the policies were fantastic and questionable, but they were accepted as part of the emergency.

On that ground the Nation, including this newspaper, supported him for a second term. There was reason to believe that as conditions improved the President would turn back to the platforms of 1932 and 1936 and administer public affairs in accord with Jeffersonian democracy. There were disappointment and criticism when he failed to do so and it became apparent that the New Deal economic fallacies were not to be discarded but to be perpetuated.

These fallacies this newspaper has cited and criticized frequently. Among them are these:

1. Attempt to pack the Supreme Court and questionable appointments.
2. The vindictive senatorial purge.
3. Endless lend and spend policies and the mistaken mischievous notion that a people can spend their way back to prosperity.
4. Readiness to borrow and boost the national debt to the stratosphere.
5. Indifference to the importance of thrift in and out of Government service.
6. Drift toward nationalization of industry and state socialism.
7. Direct and indirect denial of a man's constitutional right to work.
8. Permitting wretched discrimination by the National Labor Relations Board and refusal to strip the Wagner Act of its injustices to employers and employees alike.
9. Contempt for newspapers still free from such governmental control as is exercised over the radio.
10. Encouragement, if not stimulation, of class feeling.
11. Inexcusable indifference to the illegal sit-down strike and other forms of industrial violence.
12. Noninterference with prostitution of relief for political purposes, as in Pennsylvania and Kentucky.
13. Iniquitous undistributed-profits tax.
14. Alarming and extravagant growth in bureaucracy.
15. The yoke around the neck of free enterprise and business.
16. Fraternization with organizations under investigation for their pink-to-red complexions.
17. Preaching the heresy of scarcity as a cure for depression.
18. The dizzy notion that Government spending can create purchasing power.
19. Such wasteful projects costing millions as Quoddy, the Florida Ship Canal, the Santee-Cooper River power projects, as well as uneconomic homestead villages.
20. Concentration of authority in the Executive and the usurpation of lawmaking powers by bureaus and commissions with no recourse to the courts.
21. Disastrous and ineffective Guffey coal law.
22. Cultivating for business and others uncertainty as to the Government's next nostrum.
23. Sanctioning the evasion of the Corrupt Practices Act by using a campaign booklet as a screen to wheedle contributions out of corporations in the form of advertising.
24. Repudiation of 1932–36 campaign pledges.
25. Ruinous and unnecessary foreign silver-buying policy.
26. Collection of social-security payments and their use in the general fund.

That is a program and a prospect alike distasteful to those who believe in Democratic fundamentals. There are many like the Patriot who cherish the doctrines of Jeffersonian democracy. For them it is fortunate that in these times there is a candidate who also cherishes and believes in such Jeffersonian ideals. Mr. Willkie was a lifelong Democrat until 1936. He supported President Roosevelt in 1932. Even today he shares the President's views on foreign policies so that this cannot be a campaign issue.

In his utterances thus far Mr. Willkie reflects his Democratic background and gives evidence of sound thinking on economic and other public policies such as the Hull trade treaties. Like other Democrats, he saw his party principles distorted and displaced by New Deal fallacies. Thus far in the campaign, in the opinion of many persons, Mr. Willkie adheres more closely to the fundamental Democratic faith than do Mr. Roosevelt and his inner associates. As long as Mr. Willkie adheres to these doctrines, the course of the genuine believer in Jeffersonian democracy is clear and urgent. That course will be followed by the Patriot in its support of Mr. Willkie and the determination of issues which go to the very foundations of the American system of government.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON HERALD

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, the good people of my neighboring State of New Hampshire have long had the reputation and commendable foresight of sending as their Representatives to the Congress men of vision, wisdom, and ability in the science of government.

That they continue to do so is clearly indicated in their choice of the present incumbent from the Second District, my esteemed colleague and friend the gentleman from New Hampshire, FOSTER STEARNS. His enviable record during this his first term has more than justified the faith his constituents placed in him when they named him as their Representative in Congress.

Recognition of his ability is not alone restricted to his district and State. The Boston Herald, one of the leading New England molders of public opinion, recently paid him an editorial tribute, which I wish to include in my remarks at this point:

CONGRESSMAN STEARNS

Had they known in advance that Congress was to face new and extremely difficult problems growing out of the war in Europe, the people of the Second New Hampshire District could not have chosen better than when they sent FOSTER STEARNS, of Hancock, to represent them in Washington. His first term amply justified the confidence of his district and gave him experience which will make him all the more valuable in the second term for which he now aspires.

Of peculiar advantage to Mr. STEARNS was his service in the diplomatic corps. The value of that experience was recognized by his appointment to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, an unusual distinction for a new Member. His grasp of the foreign situation was indicated by his vote—one of seven Republicans—for the repeal of the arms embargo last September, revealing an independence which his constituents have admired. His primary victory 2 years ago, his large plurality in the election, and his more recent election as delegate to the Republican National Convention between staying on the job in Washington and promoting their own candidacies at home. The people of the Second New Hampshire District will, beyond doubt, approve the purpose of their Congressman to put his duties at Washington ahead of what he describes as "merely personal aspirations."

If Congress remains in session, Congressmen will have to choose all reveal his strength at the polls.

Labor Votes Henry Ford Best Friend

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY L. MOSER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

FORTUNE SURVEY XXXI WITH TABLE OF COMPARATIVE PREFERENCES OF AMERICAN LABOR

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the Fortune Survey XXXI, showing the great majority of American workers consider Henry Ford labor's best friend as contrasted with two other industrialists and eight avowed champions of the labor movement:

Which of these people do you feel have been on the whole helpful to labor and which harmful?

	Helpful	Harmful	Don't know
	Percent	Percent	Percent
Henry Ford	73.6	12.3	14.1
Senator Wagner	51.8	5.6	42.6
William Green	49.7	18.2	32.1
Secretary of Labor Perkins	43.4	19.4	37.2
Alfred P. Sloan, Jr	25.5	7.7	66.8
Senator Robert La Follette, Jr	22.0	5.5	72.5
Senator Burton K. Wheeler	19.1	3.2	77.7
John L. Lewis	32.6	44.6	22.8
Norman Thomas	14.1	20.5	65.4
Tom Girdler	4.4	9.7	85.9
Earl Browder	4.2	39.4	56.4

The great majority of American workers are thus shown by Fortune's impartial survey to recognize Henry Ford as a true friend of labor. They rate his helpfulness to labor high above that of any of the others on the selected list, which includes, in addition to two other industrialists, eight avowed champions of the labor movement.

More than 25 years ago Henry Ford revolutionized the industrial wage scale by doubling the going rate of factory pay at a single stroke. This one voluntary act was hailed by leaders in labor as having done "more for labor than 50 years of agitation." It was followed by scores of important, if less dramatic, advances for labor in the Ford industry.

In view of this record, there should be no surprise in finding that labor knows Henry Ford as a friend. Even the C. I. O., described by Fortune as "the most militant group in labor," gives Mr. Ford a "thumping vote of 51.5 percent," as being most helpful to labor.

Commenting on this part of the showing, the magazine says:

"It is a significant reflection of the fact that what United States labor wants most for its toil is a high wage rather than the recognition of economic and political principles."

Bolt to Willkie by Democrats Deeply Rooted—Dissatisfaction With New Deal Policies Covers Wide Range; Third Term Adds Fuel to Fire

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, many distinguished members of the Democratic Party have announced their intention of supporting Willkie and MCNARY in the Presidential election. It is clearly evident that the motivating cause of this very wide movement, which extends throughout the United States, is not due to a local condition or to minor reasons. The causes are deep-seated and go to the very foundation of the structure of our Government. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article enumerating some of the principal reasons why this movement is so widespread. The article was written by Mr. J. Roscoe Drummond, staff correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, and appeared in that publication July 31, 1940.

BOLT TO WILLKIE BY DEMOCRATS DEEPLY ROOTED—DISSATISFACTION WITH NEW DEAL POLICIES COVERS WIDE RANGE; THIRD TERM ADDS FUEL TO FIRE

(By J. Roscoe Drummond)

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., July 31.—Exactly why are so many distinguished Democrats who were early and earnest supporters of President Roosevelt quitting the New Deal and supporting the Presidential candidacy of Wendell L. Willkie?

The answer to this crucial question is becoming increasingly clear here from the varied statements by the leading Democratic recruits to the Willkie cause. With the accession today of Alfred E. Smith, 1928 Democratic Presidential candidate, and Judge Samuel Seabury to the side of the Republican nominee, it is apparent that the split in Democratic ranks is springing not from one issue but from the whole range of New Deal policies.

Analysis of the telegrams which Mr. Willkie has received lately from Democrats who voted for the President in 1932 and 1936, from Democrats who served the New Deal in the first term or the second, from Democrats who have voted their party ticket throughout their lifetime, shows them assigning seven major reasons for opposing the administration they once supported.

PRINCIPAL REASONS

They are:

1. The menace of third term to the free functioning of American democracy. This factor is advanced more frequently than others and is especially emphasized by Lewis W. Douglas and John W. Hanes, both of whom were officials of the New Deal and at one time highly praised by Mr. Roosevelt.

2. Continuous centralization of power in the hands of the Federal Government and continuous centralization of the Federal Government in the hands of the President himself, both impelling the Nation toward totalitarianism.

3. The close association of the most notorious city and State political machines with the New Deal and the dependence of the President upon their support for his third-term renomination. This view is particularly stressed again today by Judge Seabury, whom Mr. Willkie characterized as the father of the movement to clean out corrupt machine politics during the past 10 years.

4. Loose financial policies which have left the country with a dangerously unbalanced budget and uncontrolled spending which has not accomplished any of its objectives, since there remain 10,000,000 unemployed and a farm depression still unsolved.

5. The whole philosophy of scarcity economics which limit production and decrease the Nation's standard of living.

6. Inadequate defense and inadequate prospect that President Roosevelt will be able to mobilize the industrial production of the Nation to the requirements of rapid and thorough preparedness. This reason is underlined by Dr. Charles Seymour, president of Yale University, who expressed the conviction that Mr. Willkie and his policies "will assure protection against foreign danger."

7. A class-conscious government by men instead of a government by law giving equal opportunity for all. This issue is put foremost by Joseph M. Proskauer, justice of the New York State Supreme Court for 7 years and at one time an intimate adviser of Mr. Roosevelt. Judge Proskauer urged an end to "government by men who array class against class, destroy the productivity of the Nation and with half-baked schemes for the aid of the worker, actually deprive him of his chance to work."

SEABURY ANALYSIS

Judge Seabury, who almost single handedly initiated the investigation of the affairs of New York City under Mayor James J. Walker, which ultimately led to the downfall of Tammany Hall and the election of Fiorello H. La Guardia as Fusion mayor, sent Mr. Willkie a telegram endorsing his policies and pledging active support. This message sums up more fully than the others the broad case of the dissatisfied Democrat against the New Deal. It reads:

"I rejoice in the manner in which your nomination was made. You were not the choice of machine politicians or a controlled convention but of the plain people of this country who felt that the Nation needed your services at this time.

"Your declarations against the effort of despotisms to crush democracy in the continent of Europe and in Great Britain I believe express the views of the American people.

"Your nomination justifies the hope that under your Presidency order and equality of opportunity may supplant the present bureaucratic chaos which has paralyzed and demoralized industry. New Deal experiments designed to limit production and to substitute governmental regimentation for industrial and group initiative have revealed a succession of failures which have lowered the standard of living, increased the power of the Federal Government, impelling it along the way which leads to totalitarianism, and left us with an unbalanced Budget without substantially reducing the number of the unemployed."

"SIGNIFICANT THING"

The Republican nominee said that he was "greatly gratified that a man of the great public standing of Judge Seabury, and the things for which he stands in the way of clean government in opposition to machine rule, should endorse me." "It is a significant thing," he added.

Further telegrams from Democrats released today by Mr. Willkie included as assurance of support from Frederic R. Coudert, one of the most widely known international lawyers of New York City, who said that, although having twice voted for Mr. Roosevelt, he was "unalterably opposed to a third term in the Presidency of the United States." He declared that defeat of a third term was essential to the preservation of "our representative constitutional democracy."

"I do not believe," Mr. Coudert said, "in the theory of the indispensable individual. That theory inevitably leads to dictatorship."

Mrs. Gilford Dudley, of Nashville, first Tennessee woman to serve as delegate at large to a Democratic Convention, offered her services to the Republican nominee and said she would be glad to aid in any way to what she considered Mr. Willkie's "inevitable victory."

RESEARCH DIRECTOR

Mr. Willkie announced that Raymond Leslie Buell, formerly president of the Foreign Policy Association and round-table editor of Fortune magazine, who arrived here yesterday, would direct his research staff in preparing background for his principal speeches. He said that he was working on six or eight major subjects with which he would deal during the course of the campaign, these including, among others, Government finance, agriculture, labor, Government relationship to business, foreign policy, and defense.

Mr. Willkie conferred this afternoon with Gov. Payne Ratner, of Kansas, Walter Fees, Kansas State Republican chairman, and Harry Darby, Republican National Committeeman from Kansas.

In commenting upon former Governor Smith's announcement from New York, Mr. Willkie made no obscure reference to a remark which President Roosevelt tossed off at a press conference last week. Reporters had asked the President about Mr. Douglas and Mr. Hanes coming out for the Republican candidate, and Mr. Roosevelt remarked that these men had always been more interested in dollars than humanity.

PRAISE FOR SMITH

"I hope," Mr. Willkie said, "that nobody suggests that the warmhearted Alfred E. Smith, most distinguished liberal Governor New York ever had, is one of those persons who is actuated by love of money rather than love of humanity. I think it is little known that during the last several years Governor Smith has devoted more of his time than any other prominent citizen I know in New York to charitable and philanthropic works. His liberal principles as Governor were those later adopted by his two successors, Franklin Roosevelt and Herbert Lehman."

Hardly a day passes in which Mr. Willkie fails to receive some word of support from the South. L. A. Casey, coordinator of all the Democratic, independent, and nonpartisan Willkie clubs of Texas wired Mr. Willkie that Joseph W. Bailey, Jr., Democratic member of Congress from Texas from 1933 to 1935, would serve as general chairman of the movement.

"Already thousands have pledged allegiance to you here," Mr. Casey said, "and enthusiasm for your candidacy increases daily in Texas."

Mr. Speaker, in my own district there are many Democrats who have been loyal party supporters through the years, but who are unable to support the present Democratic national ticket, and have announced their intention to support the Republican nominees for President and Vice President. Under permission heretofore granted, I include a letter received from a resident of my district, Mr. Dellmore Lessard, under date of July 25, 1940, in which he announces that notwithstanding he is a Democrat, and still believes in the fundamentals of the Democratic Party as founded and advocated by Andrew Jackson and Thomas Jefferson, he will support the Willkie-McNary ticket in the fall election. The letter is as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., July 25, 1940.

At the request of many loyal, old-time Democrats who still believe in the fundamentals of the Democratic Party as founded and advocated by Andrew Jackson and Thomas Jefferson, I have called a meeting to be held in my office Monday, July 29, at 8 p. m. We propose at this meeting to form an organization of our party members who feel that Americanism and the traditions of the Democratic Party should be given first consideration in the forthcoming presidential campaign.

We believe the leadership of the present Democratic Party has, for the purpose of political preferment, willfully and deliberately abandoned those traditions which have made our party the champion in the preservation of American ideals:

In that it is now seeking a third term for President Roosevelt;

In that it has now become the part of the internationalists instead of a stronghold for the common people;

In that it has entirely ignored the platforms adopted at our national conventions;

In that it has consistently promised and has entirely failed to reduce the public debt or to balance the Budget;

In that it has consistently absorbed and encroached upon, and to a large degree, has abolished States' rights;

In that the leadership of the present Democratic Party has entirely deserted those loyal Democrats who made the victories of 1932 and 1936 possible and has consistently appointed to governmental positions those of other political faiths who have no conception of those immortal principles we deem necessary to the continuation of a free government.

We believe that real Democrats should be encouraged to stand steadfast and not change their registrations, but for the reason that the Willkie-McNary ticket at this time more nearly represents those American ideals and principles which we as good Democrats will always cherish; we should as good citizens support this ticket and assist in again establishing the ideals of our Republic. We are facing a national crisis in our party and in our country, and we must organize to meet it.

If you believe in the principles of the Democratic Party and the necessity for its perpetuation, then you are urged to be among those present in my office on Monday, July 29, at 8 p. m.

Very truly yours,

DELLMORE LESSARD.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON A. ROMJUE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the campaign that is approaching, and especially in view of the fact that Hon. Wendell Willkie, Republican nominee for President of the United States, has been so long tied up with, interested in, and managing public utilities, and in view of his great sympathetic interest in utility power companies, it is interesting to note the vote cast by Democratic Members of Congress and Republican Members of Congress in the House of Representatives on July 30, 1940, when the T. V. A. dam on Holston River to furnish power to manufacture aluminum for the purpose of building airplanes and other defense material, the roll call on the passage of the bill showed 265 Members of the House voting for and 93 Members of the House voting against this measure. The 93 voting "no" were each and every one Republicans, and there was not a single Democrat that voted against this bill.

Aluminum is one of the most important and necessary materials used in the construction of airplanes, and it is well known that airplanes are of very great importance and are indispensable in our national defense. For years the Aluminum Trust was in the hands and control largely of the Mellon group.

It is commendable that every Democrat in the House voting on this measure voted for it as against the wishes of those sponsoring Willkie's candidacy and the program and policies for which he stands.

Any thoughtful person can quite readily see that this campaign is not unlike many that have been waged before. That is, the corporation and utility interests lined up back of Mr. Willkie, the great mass of working people and middle-class people in business and farmers largely will be lined up in opposition to the Willkie utility and corporate forces. From the foundation of this great Government down to the present time there has been no President that has been more sympathetic with the unfortunate and needy human individuals than has President Roosevelt. Those for the most part who assail and criticize President Roosevelt are those who want to run the Government for their own individual benefit, without taking into consideration the needs and the rights and welfare of the great mass of humanity. I would not claim by any means that President Roosevelt has been perfect, or that any other human individual is perfect. The perfect always die young. But instead of the corporations and trusts continuing to bleed the people, as they have done in many years past, President Roosevelt and those supporting him have reversed the policy so that the benefits of the Government have been flowing more directly back to the needy and deserving agricultural and working classes.

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON POST OF JULY 24, 1940

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an editorial appearing in the Boston Post of July 24, 1940, entitled "The Children." I consider this one of the finest and most powerful editorials that I have ever read. It is an editorial worthy of profound consideration, and I am inserting it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the information of my colleagues and for the readers of the RECORD.

[From the Boston Post of July 24, 1940]

THE CHILDREN

It would be hard to find in all human annals a situation so touching as that of the children of the British Isles.

It is difficult to think of this problem, and that of the other children caught in the maelstrom of Europe, without a feeling of compassion, of deep sympathy and, in view of circumstances, despair.

For 5,000 years we have climbed the path of civilization, and now we find ourselves bound by rules and regulations, so that we cannot save children from war, from hunger, or from that awful fear which is imbedded in the minds of the very young when they watch the immolation of modern battle.

From a human standpoint, we cannot be proud of the efforts we have made in this country to solve this problem.

From the same standpoint, the British Government is just as much at fault as ours.

It is easy to blame Hitler, but that does not answer the final question.

What shall we do, in the name of humanity, to save the children?

Not long ago the British Ministry of Shipping decided that it would take steps to take children out of England on empty troop ships headed away from the British Isles.

This decision caused thousands of parents, at what mental anguish no one knows, to throngs to public places and register their children for this flight to safety.

In the meantime, the submarine and aerial war intensified. The plans were canceled. Voices were raised in Parliament protesting that the children of the rich, hundreds and hundreds of them, are safe in America or in other places, but the children of the poor must remain to await the onslaught.

In this country hundreds of thousands of people have been shocked by this cruel trick of fate.

Appeals have poured in from many to be allowed to take these children into their homes until the war is over. Americans love children, no matter where they are, and this was a manifestation of the great heart of America.

The British Government complains that it is short of warships to convoy these cargoes of mercy.

The American Government is bound by the neutrality law and cannot send after the children.

Thus we have the spectacle of two mighty nations, preening themselves in their democracy and respectability, standing idly by while the military minds of Germany coolly plot the destruction of England.

It is one of the blackest pages of human history.

LETTER FROM CHAIRMAN OF AMERICAN YOUTH CONGRESS AND REPLY

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith a letter received from Mr. Jack McMichael, chairman, American Youth Congress, inviting me to join a committee of emergency peace mobilization, which is to hold a meeting at Chicago on August 3 and 4 next. I include also my reply to the invitation.

The letters are as follows:

EMERGENCY PEACE MOBILIZATION,
June 21, 1940.

Hon. EDWARD J. HART,
The House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HART: Each day the danger of America's involvement in the European war becomes more immediate. Yet we all know that the American people do not want war.

There is yet time to unite and organize this will for peace. America is a democracy. If the people speak, they shall be heard and their will shall prevail.

Young people, who will be the first to do the fighting and the dying, have suggested that all who oppose American participation in the war join in an emergency peace mobilization in Chicago, August 3 and 4, the twenty-sixth anniversary of the outbreak of the first World War. They ask leaders in all walks of American life—labor, farm, unemployed, church, Negro, women, scientists, journalists, etc.—to form a committee to defend America by keeping out of war, in order to sponsor this mobilization.

We ask you to join the committee, which will choose an executive board with full responsibility for the program and organization of the mobilization.

In the mobilization the American people will insist that the best defense of America is to keep our country at peace. They will express their determination to protect labor standards, the rights of religious and racial minorities, social welfare, and civil liberties. This is the test, whether our present defense policy is really one of defense or one of preparation for participation in the war.

As a prominent citizen, we urge you to join with thousands more to give the leadership which the American people are seeking and make possible the democratic expression of our united desire.

Sincerely yours,

JACK MCMICHAEL,
Chairman, American Youth Congress.

P. S.—Please rush your reply by return mail or collect wire to Dr. Walter Rautenstrauch, One Hundred and Seventeenth Street and Broadway, New York City.

JUNE 22, 1940.

Mr. JACK MCMICHAEL,
Chairman, American Youth Congress, One Hundred and Seventeenth Street and Broadway, New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: I have yours of June 21 advising me of the emergency peace mobilization in Chicago on August 3 and 4.

While I am glad to do everything I can for the continuance of peace, I would not join any organization for peace or anything else unless I had absolute, complete assurances that there were no members of the Communist Party and no Communist sympathizers or other elements who place the interests of other countries above America in the group. Not having any such assurances concerning your organization, I must decline to join with it.

Very sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. HART.

Training of Physicians and Surgeons

HON. LEE E. GEYER

COMMUNICATION FROM THE UNITED MEDICAL SERVICE

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, while we are talking of preparedness it might be well to think in terms of an adequate supply of physicians and surgeons.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I present a communication from the United Medical Service, along with their recommendations, as follows:

UNITED MEDICAL SERVICE,
Chicago, Ill., July 26, 1940.

Subject: Adequate supply of physicians and surgeons for both the defensive forces and the civilian population of the United States.

To: Hon. Lee E. Geyer:

The enclosed statement sets forth the pressing need for immediate action to provide physicians and surgeons, both for the defensive forces about to be called into service as well as the civilian population of these United States.

J. A. RYAN,
Brigadier General, United States Army, Retired.
J. G. BERKOWITZ, M. D.

Present world conditions, and those in Europe particularly, have aroused our people to the necessity for an adequate preparedness program by our Government, and measures are being taken to increase the personnel of our Army, Navy, aviation, and all other services necessary, as well as increasing its equipment and supplying it with all modern implements necessary to place us in a complete state of defense and preparedness.

All previous wars have shown that unless medical care is adequate deaths due to disease far exceed those due to the casualties of war.

Thus far, to our knowledge, nothing has been said as to the necessity of increasing the number of physicians and surgeons in the United States in order to supply the number of doctors necessary to care for both the preparedness program and the public.

At present the number of physicians in the United States is not based upon the great need of the public for curative and preventive medical care but rather upon its ability to pay for the medical services rendered. We have today about 175,000 physicians to care for our more than 130,000,000 population, which means 1 physician for every 750 of our people.

The defense program as submitted by competent leaders indicates the need of 1 physician to every 175 to 200 enlisted personnel. This makes the proportion of doctors per 1,000 personnel needed for the different services almost four times the number at present available and used by our civilian population.

We speak of being adequately prepared for any emergency in possibly a period of a year or two, and of training aviators over a period of 6 months, but it takes many years to educate and train a doctor. After his premedical preparation of 4 years, he still has to go through 4 years of study at a medical college, and 2 years of hospital internship; in addition, he must study for several years in any specialty in which he may desire to become proficient.

While we have today in the United States about 175,000 doctors, in case of an emergency, there would be many rejections due to age, lack of knowledge, physical disability, marital status, and for various other reasons. This would serve to reduce tremendously the number of doctors, possibly to less than 120,000 from which to select the medical personnel for a possible enlisted force of 6,000,000. This would require 30,000 physicians on active duty, not including the number necessary for replacement and in training, and it would be difficult even to withdraw a much smaller number without leaving the general public seriously unprotected.

Investigation will disclose that over a number of years there has been a progressive reduction in the number of medical teaching institutions. Also, those medical schools, private or State controlled, still in existence have been progressively reducing the number of new admissions every year to study for the medical profession. This is a definite policy of the American Medical Association and State medical societies. It has been done to control and restrict the number of physicians and surgeons that are to be available to the public in the years to come. It is not based upon lack of men possessing proper qualifications to study for the medical profession, for many more than are accepted are admitted to premedical courses and qualified in this free democratic country of equal opportunities to all, and are then told there is no room for them, even in the State-tax-supported medical schools. If this situation is allowed to continue, it will prove disastrous for the preparedness program and the general public. To meet this great need of preparedness to be adequately prepared the following plan should be adopted without delay.

(1) All existing medical schools should be required to increase the number of admissions without delay up to the limit of their existing facilities and if necessary these facilities should be increased.

(2) Vacation periods should be abolished; a medical student could then concentrate the required number of hours study and preparation over a period of 3 years instead of 4 years.

(3) Plans should be developed whereby part of their hospital training and internship should be incorporated during this period of schooling.

(4) Just as the Government is paying for the training of men in all the branches of service such as aviation, Army, Navy, et cetera, it should appoint duly qualified men who have met the premedical requirements to study medicine and pay for their continued education and training. These medical students should be at once enrolled as members of a medical cadet reserve corps.

(5) The Government, in addition to the existing medical schools, should develop medical schools at all the base hospitals where their medical officer personnel and facilities are or could be made sufficiently adequate to teach general medicine and all its branches. (The Walter Reed Hospital would be particularly fitted for this purpose.)

(6) The course of study should be arranged so that while all members of the medical students reserve corps receive the same basic education in medicine, each medical cadet at the same time should specialize and receive special instruction in one of the branches of medicine so that on the completion of their full course each could be assigned at once to that particular branch in which he has received specialized training. In case of extreme emergency the Government could at once use these medical cadets to act as assistants to trained medical officers in their different specialties in field hospitals.

From present indications the next 10 years will be filled with strife or preparations for strife and if we hope to protect the freedom of our people and our form of government on the Western Continent from the rule of dictators, an adequate supply of trained medical men is as necessary for the success of our efforts as are the other commissioned officers and personnel that lead and fight in the various services.

We realize that our goal of a navy on each ocean will take some years—it takes 4 years to build a battleship so our plans are laid accordingly. We must remember that under present conditions it takes at least 10 years to make a doctor. We have not at present a sufficient force of medical men to adequately care for the population, if we are to make medical care, treatment, and prevention available to all, let alone provide for the different services that are necessary for our defense program and this necessity can be met only by timely measures taken at once, as outlined above, for the training of more men and women for the medical profession to meet this emergency and continued need for medical care by the public.

This plan may arouse the opposition of the American Medical Association and the branch State medical societies in view of their present policies, but, in spite of this, there will be many qualified physicians who would place the country's need before their association policies and provide the cooperation to meet this need.

Brigadier General, United States Army, Retired.

Warmongering Financiers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN, NEW YORK, N. Y., OF AUGUST 3, 1940

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Gaelic American,

New York, August 3, 1940, on the subject Warmongering Financiers, as follows:

[From the Gaelic American, New York, August 3, 1940.]

WARMONGERING FINANCIERS

The Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, of which William Allen White, is national chairman has inserted on July 30, a five-column advertisement in papers all over the country. The first advertisement from the same source appeared on June 10. The cost of such advertisements reaches in the hundreds of thousands of dollars and those who pay the piper are personally interested in the welfare of the British Empire. Like all the internationalists the members of the committee are shouting that America has been protected from invasion, since its establishment as a nation, by the English fleet and that defeat of the English would expose us to invasion by a victorious Germany. On this point the committee's advertisement is not clear and the average American cannot see clearly how the English fleet is now or had been at any time the protector of their country. Who was the enemy from whom that fleet ever protected the United States? Who sacked Washington and burned the National Capitol in the War of 1812? The declarations of President Roosevelt and Wendell Willkie on World War No. 2 are quoted while the platforms of both parties and the planks which oppose the sending our military forces into the foreign conflict are entirely ignored.

The burden of the advertisement of July 30 is an appeal to the Washington administration to let England have 60 over-age American destroyers which the pro-English committee say that we could spare without weakening our own under-sized Military Establishment. In other words the Committee is more concerned about England's military requirements than for those of America. The men, who are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in newspaper publicity are more English than American and care more for the safety of a foreign country than that of their own. To help England they would drive a coach and four through American neutrality in their eagerness to give military aid to an imperialist power that has annexed one-fourth of the land surface of the globe by force, conquest and crooked diplomacy.

The Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies—the title has not been altered to conform to changed conditions as so far England has no ally since the fall of France—this committee and its membership were exposed in the Senate on July 11 by Senator HOLT. Mr. HOLT referred in part as follows to those who paid for the newspaper advertisements of June 10:

"Now, let us see who paid for the advertisement. I have found out, and I think the Senate should have the facts. You find it is not the little fellows who paid for this advertisement "Stop Hitler Now!" Let us see who did. You find in that list the directors of international banks, and I will name them in a moment. You will find directors of corporations of Great Britain and the British Empire. No wonder they are interested. But they make it appear that they are doing so for America. We find bondholders of foreign countries that are so involved. We find international lawyers who have business in the countries now involved in war. We find directors of manganese corporations, we find directors of mechanical equipment corporations that make equipment for warring nations. We find directors of oil companies. Anyone knows what oil means in time of war. We find a director of a cellulcid company, we find directors of metal companies, we find directors of electric companies, directors of steamship lines, and others interested in aircraft corporation.

"The partial list is as follows:

"Guaranty Trust Co., with branch offices in Antwerp, Brussels, Havre, Liverpool, Paris, and London, controls French-American Banking Corporation jointly with Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris and First National Bank of Boston. This corporation does an internaticnal banking business.

"Kuhn, Loeb & Co., international banking.

"Drexel & Co., interlocked with J. P. Morgan & Co.

"J. P. Morgan & Co., interlocked with banking operations in London and Paris and one of the best known international banking firms.

"Lehman Bros., international banking."

Mr. HOLT also named Mrs. Averell Harriman; Mrs. H. P. Davidson; Mrs. Daniel Gugghenheim; Mrs. John Schiff, wife of a partner of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.; Cornelius D. Whitney; Thomas W. Lamont, director of J. P. Morgan & Co.; John Thomas of Lehman Brothers; J. D. Levy, director of Columbia Broadcasting Co.; Jerome H. Louchheim, bank director and director of Columbia Broadcasting; Samuel Goldwyn; Maxwell Anderson; Fred Astaire; Irving Berlin; Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.; Lynn Fontaine; Myrna Loy; Alfred Lunt; Paul Muni; and Robert Sherwood.

The advertisement of June 10 had the approval of President Roosevelt, and it was paid for by banking firms and those who make profits from war. The banks and industrial organizations, should America enter the war, will be enriched by millions of dollars and they can be relied on to do their utmost to bring about involvement. The members of the committee are more interested in their investments abroad than in the welfare of America. Defeat of England would actually mean a collapse of their banking business abroad and their losses would go into the billions. The international financiers are nervous and uneasy and would not hesitate, in order to save their vast fortunes, to hurl the flower of American manhood into the European shambles.

The Committee to Aid America by Defending the Allies is more dangerous to the well-being of America than the "fifth column" or the Trojan horses. It is believed that Mr. William Allen White, who is a well-meaning man, is a dupe of the financiers, who are putting up the money for the advertisements. The names of the plotters are known as well as their connections, and the people should rise in righteous wrath against them. They lack loyalty to their own country and their wealth and assumed respectability should not be permitted to shield them from their baseness. Their allegiance follows their investments. They are internationalists, not Americans.

Campaign To Oust National Anthem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN, NEW YORK, N. Y., JULY 27, 1940

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Gaelic American, New York, July 27, 1940, entitled "Campaign To Oust National Anthem."

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Gaelic American, New York, N. Y., July 27, 1940]

CAMPAIGN TO OUST NATIONAL ANTHEM

Another campaign to oust The Star-Spangled Banner from its pride of place is in full swing and the leaders of it would scrap Francis Scott Key's immortal national anthem for Irving Berlin's God Bless America. By clever manipulation, the latter song has been featured at recent conventions of the Republican and Democratic Parties held in Philadelphia and Chicago. The song is also exploited in the theaters and over the radio systems all over the country.

For nearly two generations British propagandists have been attacking The Star-Spangled Banner, mainly on the alleged ground that it keeps alive hatred against England. It has also been alleged that it is full of pride and boasting, and some critics have gone as far as to assert that the song is unsingable.

Those who pretend that the anthem promotes hate and war ignore that the last verse breathes deep religious and sublime sentiments. The verse is as follows:

"O, thus be it ever, when freemen shall stand
Between their loved home and the war's desolation!
Blest with victory and peace, may the heav'n-rescued land
Praise the power that hath made and preserved us a Nation.
Then conquer we must, when our cause is just,
And this be our motto, "In God is our trust;"
And The Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Most of the critics ignore the occasion which inspired Francis Scott Key's immortal song. The poet, who was aboard an enemy's ship, was uncertain whether Fort McHenry had fallen into the hands of the English invaders. When in the early morning's light he saw the flag of his country floating proudly over Fort McHenry, he knew that the enemy had failed in the attack on the fort and Baltimore city. Small wonder that he poured out his soul in words that will live as long as the United States. His description of the bombardment is only what may be expected in the composition of any American who could put his ideas and feelings into a hymn of thanksgiving.

The first public attack on The Star-Spangled Banner was made by Sir Howard Vincent, in the 1904 Christmas edition of the New York Herald. He pleaded that the third verse of the anthem should be cut out in the interest of harmony between the peoples of the two nations This request was approved editorially by the New York Herald, which was then owned by the late James Gorden Bennett.

As a matter of fact, Sir Vincent's request to cut out the third verse of the song had already been carried out in several of the books in use in American schools.

This stealthy plot was unmasked, the people throughout the country were aroused by this glaring instance of foreign interference in American schools. Several States passed laws making illegal the circulation in the schools of books giving an emasculated version of Key's immortal song. The publishers who had deleted the third stanza had to call in their books and supply books giving the correct unabridged version of the national anthem.

The anti-Americans claim that the anthem is poor as a literary effort, that the theme is episodic, that the words breathe the spirit of war, and that the song is unsingable.

Is The Star-Spangled Banner an anthem unworthy of the United States? Anybody who will examine it with a mind free from bias or self-interest cannot come to any other conclusion than that it is one of the finest hymns possessed by any nation. Possibly the Marseillaise may be a shade superior to it as an anthem, but on this point there is great divergence of opinion. True, an episode in the War of 1812 inspired the song, yet it is an apostrophe to the flag, which will thrill for all time the heart of every patriotic American. The flag and the anthem have become associated forever, and the flag itself is called The Star-Spangled Banner.

Is the anthem unsingable? Everybody who has heard it frequently sung by big audiences and by large congregations will deny this allegation. Up to a very recent period it never occurred to any normal American that the anthem is unsingable.

The critics also complain that the hymn is set to the music of a drinking song. Surely this is not a draw-back. The music is more solemn than convivial. Anybody hearing it played on the organ would be inclined to place it in the category of sacred music.

The composer of the music is unknown. The air is the same as To Anacreon in Heaven, which was put to the music of an air much older than the song itself. As to whether the air is Irish, English, French, or German, the question has not yet been settled, and authorities are not in agreement.

Most critics of our national anthem are not Americans. The reference to England as the foe and despoiler is what has concentrated attacks on the national anthem. Had this reference been omitted, and had the foe been any other nation than England, there would have been no long-continued attacks on Key's immortal song. The reasons for the attacks are known. So also are the attackers. The flag and the anthem have become entwined. He who does not appreciate the anthem has no love for the flag.

The new move against The Star-Spangled Banner is more subtle than previous frontal attacks which ended in failure. God Bless America has some merit, but it can never take the place of Scott Key's inspired song. In the attempt to dislodge it the press agents and the theaters will have no more success than had the campaign conducted by foreign propagandists. They cannot immortalize commonplace compositions which will not be remembered for one generation. The Star-Spangled Banner has survived more than a century and a quarter, and it will live as long as the United States, which has, since Scott Key's time, become a giant among the nations.

Deportation of Harry Bridges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

LETTER FROM MSGR. JOHN A. RYAN

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, there are few men in America who command the honor, respect, and love of people more generally than does Msgr. John A. Ryan, the head of the National Catholic Welfare Conference.

I am pleased, therefore, to include with my remarks a letter from Father Ryan on the subject of the bill for the forthright deportation of Harry Bridges, as follows:

JULY 6, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
Chairman, Committee on Immigration,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KING: Some of us are so greatly disturbed over the action of the House of Representatives in passing the bill for the forthright deportation of Harry Bridges that we are requesting the opportunity for a hearing on the bill before the subcommittee of the Senate to which it has been referred. We regard this bill as a grave infringement of the spirit as well as the letter of the Bill of Rights. In all probability, it violates the due-process clause of the fifth amendment; for the Supreme Court has held in at least two cases that the word "person" in the fifth amendment includes aliens, even natives of China (Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U. S. 238, and Li Sing v. United States, 180 U. S. 495). In its present form the bill would deport Harry Bridges without a hearing or any kind of proceeding that could be regarded as due process.

Even if it be not unconstitutional, the bill is revolutionary, arbitrary, and extremely dangerous as a precedent. If Harry Bridges can be deported in this fashion, so can any other alien whom Congress does not like, when it succumbs to the factitious hysteria of the moment. Congress should hesitate long before it sanctions this unwarranted inovation and creates this horrendous precedent.

Harry Bridges is a pest and a nuisance. While he has stimulated the unionization of large groups of workers on the Pacific coast and obtained for them considerable economic benefits, he has done much more harm than good to the cause of organized labor as a whole. Nevertheless, he is as much entitled to the protection of the Constitution and of the regular forms of law and judicial procedure as any other alien. The fifth amendment does not say that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, "except aliens who have become undesirable." In fact, the Bill of Rights was designed in no small degree for the benefit of such unpopular persons as Harry Bridges. Respectable persons seldom, if ever, need the protection of the due-process clause. It is the unrespectable, the unpopular, the despised minorities, the politically weak, and the socially helpless who stand most in need of this protection. The Bill of Rights is based upon the fundamental, ethical principle that even members of the foregoing classes are human beings, endowed with a moral and indestructible dignity of personality, and requiring civil protection for the fundamental rights of personality. In this respect, the United States differs sharply and completely from totalitarian countries. In the present critical situation, we ought scrupulously to refrain from any act which would enable the totalitarian states to point at us the finger of scorn and to assert that we care no more than they for individual human rights.

So we hope and trust, dear Mr. Chairman, that the subcommittee of the Committee on Immigration will afford the opportunity of a hearing to those who hold the views set forth in the preceding paragraphs and likewise to those who approve the passing of the bill by the House of Representatives.

Sincerely yours,

Rt. Rev. JOHN A. RYAN, D. D.

My Report to the People of Mason County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my established practice, I hereby render my report and account of my official record to the citizens of Mason County.

I agree with the many thousands of citizens who have written to me that our first task remains that of keeping our country out of war. I shall continue my vigorous support of neutrality legislation. We are the only neutral nation in the world whose ships and citizens have not been attacked.

I shall cooperate vigorously in supporting President Roosevelt's national-defense program and am remaining at my post of duty in order to do so.

May I take this opportunity to sincerely thank my fellow citizens for their kind expressions of approval of my work in Congress; their generous letters have been a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Influence in Congress depends upon seniority of service on important committees. Why throw away the influence of seniority and experience? What do candidates have to offer except their own personal ambition? I now rank sixth out of a membership of 27 on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, having started at the bottom of the ladder in 1933. As a direct result, we have had more regular worthy river and harbor, jetty and flood-control projects approved and carried out in Southwest Washington during my period of service than during the entire previous history of our State. It is also my privilege to be chairman of the Pensions Committee, which gives me added rank and prestige in the House. I also am serving on the important Committee on Education, vital to the students and faculties in our public schools and colleges, and on the Indian Affairs and War Claims Committees.

When politicians are desperate they sometimes resort to issues of the most trivial and amusing nature, and this year for the first time the Congressman's county of legal residence is seemingly being made such an issue.

I have been a permanent resident of southwest Washington for 30 years and have been continuously visiting all the communities in the district and am, therefore, thoroughly familiar with conditions and problems in every community. However, length of residence in the district is important, for a comparative newcomer from a distant part of the State could not be expected to know our people nor our problems and would consequently not be qualified to represent our interests effectively.

The particular city or county in which the Congressman resides has absolutely no bearing on his effectiveness to serve his district, which depends on his length of service, his rank, and his experience.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, who is retiring after 24 years in Congress, paid a tribute the other day to the seasoned Members of the House.

The rest of the States, he said, should follow the example of Texas in reelecting its Congressmen, then they would control more committee chairmanships. Texas, with 21 Members in the House today, holds 5 chairmanships, he pointed out. It is exceeded only by New York with 6 out of its 45 Members holding committee chairmanships. The Texas Congressman ended by quoting former Speaker Champ Clark:

A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

IMPROVED BUSINESS CONDITIONS

The steady improvement in business conditions and recovery from the depths of 1929–33 continue.

I shall never forget the gloom and despair of the merchants, laborers, farmers, and people generally in 1932, when I visited Shelton, Hoodsport, Lilliwaup, Harstine Island, Belfair, and all sections of Mason County. There were hardly any jobs or money in circulation; prices were down and there was no market. Conditions are vastly different now, and we are far better situated than we were then.

GOVERNMENT AID AND COOPERATION

Not only has this beneficial change been wrought, but our Government has also aided and cooperated in the construction of many worth-while projects which make our local communities better places in which to live.

SHELTON POST OFFICE

When I took my seat in Congress in 1933, the first person who spoke to me about endeavoring to secure a Federal Post Office Building for Shelton was the late Mark Reed. Mr. Reed called at my office in the Capital and discussed the matter with me. I was profoundly impressed with his civic pride and deep interest in Shelton and Mason County and all her people. I immediately introduced the bill in Congress and after four years of persistent effort we secured the allocation of funds in 1937, and on August 6, 1939, the beautiful new Shelton Post Office, costing $72,743, was formally dedicated with appropriate ceremonies. I stated in my dedicatory address that it was a source of extreme regret to all that Mr. Reed did not live to witness the fulfillment of a desire which was so close to his heart and uppermost in his endeavors. Apparently the large concourse of citizens who were present agreed with me when I said that the edifice would be a lasting monument to the memory of this great industrial leader and community builder.

SKOKOMISH INDIAN SCHOOL

On May 11, 1937, I introduced the bill authorizing $25,000 for construction of a new school building for Skokomish School District No. 2, Mason County, and after obtaining its enactment by Congress obtained the PWA allocation of funds. The school building was constructed in 1939. It was the only Indian school project authorized by Congress in the 75th Congress, all the other bills being objected to on the House Calendar and some of which are still pending. This school was badly needed and will serve the Indian and white children in the district.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

During the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, there was expended by the Federal Government in Mason County the sum of $935,828, and loaned therein the additional sum of $139,113, a total of $1,074,941.

Flood control, school, road, street, sewer, park, sanitation, transmission-line projects have been provided and will constitute valuable community assets for many years to come and serve future generations as well as our own.

MY PROGRESSIVE LABOR RECORD

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress, I have supported and voted for every piece of legislation of benefit to labor. I realize that our business prosperity is measured by the income and wages received by labor and agriculture. I have therefore supported their reasonable demands 100 percent. We have conferred upon labor the same right as that enjoyed by their employers, viz, to bargain collectively in regard to wages, working hours, and working conditions. I have had the active support of every branch of organized labor and the railroad brotherhoods ever since I have been a Member of Congress and intend to continue to merit and deserve their support in the future as I have in the past. I have likewise heartily supported all legislation designed to accord to our Federal and Postal workers more liberal treatment. They serve the public faithfully and efficiently and should be treated accordingly.

WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

For 4 years I served as a member of the steering committee of 22 House Members, which led the successful fight for the soldiers' bonus. Instead of paying our veterans in bullets, tear bombs, and poison gas, the way the bonus army was "paid," we paid in cash in 1936 the bonus which had been delinquent since 1924. Veterans in Mason County thus received $219,287.88.

I have sponsored two bills familiar to every Spanish War veteran, the Smith bill of 1935, paying their pensions in full, and the Philippine travel pay bill of 1940, as well as numerous other measures for hospitalization, increased benefits, and so forth.

I have favored every bill in the interests of the veterans of the World War, their widows and dependents, which has come before Congress, and am nationally known for my active support of veterans' legislation. I shall continue this policy, for it is my firm belief that it is the solemn duty and sacred obligation of our Government never to forget but always to remember and to compensate to the fullest possible extent those who have defended our Republic. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have always received from the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United Spanish War Veterans, the Disabled American Veterans, and their auxiliaries.

FEDERAL HOUSING—HOME OWNERS' LOAN—BANK AND SAVINGS AND LOAN DEPOSITS

As one of the five members of the House who conferred with President Roosevelt March 20, 1934, and sponsored the first housing legislation in Congress, I am gratified at the benefits which have accrued therefrom to our people. In Mason County 20 citizens have received loans aggregating $55,200 for the construction, modernization, and repair of their homes. This has been of vast benefit to the workers in the building trades, including electricians, painters, and plumbers, and the lumber, plywood, shingle, and other allied industries.

I actively supported the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act and expressed my belief in this legislation on April 28, 1933, in these words:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to render available the sum of $2,000,000,000 to restore, redeem, rehabilitate, and save the homes of many of the American people, and, Mr. Speaker, when we save the homes of the American people, we save America.

Depositors in the bank at Shelton have their deposits up to $5,000 insured by the Federal Government under the acts of Congress which I heartily supported and voted for. The 566 depositors in the Mason County Savings & Loan Association likewise have their deposits insured under the same legislation. I am happy and proud that the Roosevelt administration has provided this protection and security for our people and that it has been my privilege to have a humble part in bringing about these great reforms which should have been introduced many years ago.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

As an active member of the House Committee on Education, I have vigorously favored providing in public works and relief appropriation bills adequate funds to aid in paying the salaries of school teachers and maintain, repair, and improve our public-school buildings, as well as institutions of higher learning, as I consider the cause of public education and the recommendations of our parent-teacher associations to be paramount.

I favor the following program:

First. Adequate free public education for the children of the United States.

Second. Adequate pay for public-school teachers as a matter of justice and as a means of retaining in and attracting to the teaching profession the most competent, devoted, and best-equipped men and women.

Third. An annual minimum of at least 8 months teaching in the public schools of all the States.

Fourth. An adequate number of safe, commodious, and well-equipped school buildings.

Fifth. Free text books for all public-school pupils.

Sixth. Adequate assistance by the Federal Government through appropriations and otherwise, in accomplishing the foregoing objects.

Seventh. Such of the allied purposes as may serve the best interests of the teachers and pupils and the P. T. A. in making the public schools a more effective, far-reaching, and American force in local, State, and National life.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

I have been an ardent, outspoken advocate of old-age pensions during my service in Congress. I have continued the interest which, as a veteran member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, I have manifested for the past 25 years. I have on every occasion promptly signed every petition to bring old-age pension and general-welfare legislation before the Congress for action.

I was the first Member of Congress to publicly espouse the Townsend plan in 1934 and in a brief 6 years have, as a member of our steering committee, actively participated in the growth of our movement until today we are approximating a sufficient following in the House of Representatives to enact our legislation in its present form into law. The United States Senate recently for the first time authorized a thorough study of the Townsend plan. In view of this progress we confidently expect to reelect enough of our old supporters and elect a sufficient number of new supporters in the elections this year to enact H. R. 8264 into law in the next Congress.

FARM LEGISLATION

The farm problem is recognized as the most difficult with which we have to deal, having been acute since 1920. We have done more for the farmer than any previous national administration and have since 1932 doubled our farm income. We have recaptured our lost foreign export trade in agricultural products, without sacrificing our home markets, and should you desire the official Government statistics bearing on this entire subject, please write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., or write to me and I shall be glad to obtain them for you. Self-seeking politicians running for office do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the facts. Therefore, if you are interested in ascertaining the true facts, I shall be glad to assist you in doing so. We have not entirely solved the farm problem but we have made more progress toward a solution than any previous national administration.

The condition of the farmer everywhere is much better than it was in 1932, when his prices and market were the worst in the history of American agriculture. Think back to 1932 and compare the lot of the average farmer in your own neighborhood as it was then with his condition today in 1940 and you will realize this fact. We intend to keep on helping the farmer. It remains my opinion that the Grange cost-of-production plan, to insure the farmer parity prices with industry, offers the best solution of the farm problem. In the next Congress I shall again vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture and would be glad to have you verify this fact by writing Mr. Ervin E. King, master of the Washington State Grange, 3104 Western Avenue, Seattle, Wash., or Mr. Fred Brenckman, legislative representative, National Grange, 1343 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES

One of the most important enterprises which can be encouraged by the Federal Government is the developing, propagating, and conserving of our fish and game resources. I have therefore at all times cooperated with the House Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources and the various pogy, wildlife, sportsmen's game, and rod and gun clubs and associations in southwest Washington. I voted for the Robertson-Pittman Act last year and the appropriation this year of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. The Federal contribution to our State is estimated at $60,575, to be matched by the State contributing $20,191.66, a total of $80,766.66. I have actively cooperated in obtaining W. P. A. and Federal funds for fish hatcheries, fish ponds, and fish and game preserves and wildlife projects in southwest Washington.

I have given prompt attention to the requests received from the holders of fish and game licenses in Southwest Washington for information regarding the Federal laws and pending legislation relating to the subject of wildlife.

BONNEVILLE—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

I am proud of my sponsorship of the Bonneville $70,000,000 project and rural-electrification projects and shall exert every effort to bring their benefits to all our citizens.

Through the Work Projects Administration an allotment of $46,316 has been provided to construct electric power transmission lines with transformers, anchors, and connections, to serve Mason County rural areas.

LUMBER, SHINGLES, PULP, PLYWOOD INDUSTRIES

During my entire service in Congress on every occasion, without a single exception, I have supported and voted for beneficial legislation desired by the lumber, shingle, pulp, and plywood industries and advantageous to their workers, and have at all times extended to them my whole-hearted cooperation. Self-seeking politicians apparently have no scruples in misrepresenting the facts. Therefore, if you wish to verify my statement in regard to my official record, I would suggest that you write to the official legislative representatives of the organizations to which our local industries belong: Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager, West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 364 Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., 340 White-Henry-Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; Henry Bahr, counsel, National Lumber Manufacturers Association, 1337 Connecticut Ave., Washington, D. C.; Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, Tacoma Building, Tacoma, Wash.; O. M. Porter, secretary, United States Pulp Producers Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

In the general election 2 years ago, in 1938, my Republican opponent had the nerve to display a bundle of shingles and talk about protection for shingles. At that time and for 5 years previously the shingle industry and workers enjoyed a 25-percent quota, the only protection in 25 years. The Republicans kept shingles on the duty-free list for 25 years, without any quota, causing Senator HOMER T. BONE, in the campaign in 1932, to say: "The shingle industry was ruined because of this fact."

In the period since I took my seat in Congress in 1933, the shingle industry has been revived, old mills remodeled and equipped with new machinery, and new mills built, until now we have three times as many plants and number of shingle weavers employed as in 1932.

November 18, 1935, Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

I hasten to send you this brief note to thank you for the fine help we received from you in our fight to secure the import quota on Canadian shingles. I want to express to you my appreciation of your efforts in our behalf.

To render the quota more effective, I introduced the bill which became law for a census of the shingle industry. On May 27, 1937, Mr. McGrath wrote when President Roosevelt signed my bill:

This news is about the most important that has come to red cedar shingle manufacturers and the logging and lumber operators associated with the shingle business.

February 1, 1938, the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

At the annual membership meeeting of this association, held in Tacoma February 1, 1938, a resolution was unanimously approved instructing the secretary to write you expressing the gratitude of this association for your faithful services in our behalf in connection with the import limitations on red cedar shingles.

On November 2, 1938, the following news article was published in the Hoquiam Washingtonian:

SHINGLE WEAVERS COMMEND SMITH

A resolution endorsing MARTIN F. SMITH in his campaign for reelection to Congress was passed this week by Grays Harbor Shingle Weavers, Local 2576. The resolution endorsing SMITH is being sent to all shingle-weaver unions in the district council. The resolution commends Congressman SMITH for diligent work in limiting importation of Canadian shingles into the United States.

In this Congress I have actively cooperated in efforts to secure aid for the workers and the shingle industry. Following vigorous efforts before the State Department and Ways and Means Committee, we have recently secured the passage of a bill providing for a duty of 25 cents per square on red cedar shingles imported from Canada, the first duty imposed in 29 years. On June 28, 1940, David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

The final passage of our shingle bill in the Senate on June 22 brings to a conclusion the long struggle to put shingles back on the duty list. To say that we are pleased expresses our feeling very mildly.

Having full knowledge of the difficulty of getting a tariff bill through Congress, and particularly one giving protection to the shingle or lumber industries, we are grateful for the continuous thought and effort you have given our affairs.

All during the struggle, since January 1, it has been heartening to know that you were tirelessly working for the passage of our shingle bill, and it has been of great value to the writer to be able to confer with you at any time when a conference was deemed necessary. You have been "on the job" for us, and we are very appreciative.

With best wishes for your continued success, we remain,

Yours truly,

UNITED STATES RED CEDAR SHINGLE INDUSTRY, INC.,
By DAVID M. WILLIAMS,
Secretary-Manager.

I would suggest that when candidates of the opposing party talk about shingles that citizens ask them about the do-nothing record of their party for 25 years, and the do-something record of the Roosevelt administration and request an explanation. I would appreciate citizens writing me briefly what explanation, if any, they give. I am curious, as you must be, after reading the foregoing recital of fact, to know what alibi and excuse they have to offer.

LUMBER EXCISE TAX

The lumber business is the best it has been in 10 years. Last year pay rolls and wages in private industry were the highest in the history of the State.

A candidate for Congress should have respect for the voters and for the office he is seeking. What about the candidate who deliberately circulates malicious falsehoods? Two years ago and again this year the same falsehood is being circulated and published that Members of Congress from our State, including myself, voted to reduce the excise tax on lumber. The best answer to this campaign lie was made December 12, 1938, by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager and legislative representative of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, of which our local lumber firms are members:

The west coast lumber industry has had the effective and loyal support of Mr. SMITH on every occasion when we have been asking for his help. He has voted for renewal of the excise tax on imported lumber on every occasion when the matter has been before Congress. He has supported our efforts to have lumber properly defined for taxing purposes, as in the classification of large timbers and with withdrawal of allowances for planing and milling. He has helped us in every question arising for the clarification and administration of the excise tax.

The West Coast Lumbermen's Association keeps wholly out of politics. I just want, as a matter of fairness, to point out that Mr. SMITH has been a very loyal and conscientious supporter of the interests of the lumber industry since he entered Congress. I feel it only square that this fact be made known.

Sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Secretary-Manager.

My amendment of the lumber import excise tax, known as the Smith amendment, introduced as H. R. 7934, was attached to the Revenue Act in 1938 and passed the Senate, was approved by President Roosevelt and became law. It prevents deductions for tonguing, planing, and grooving of imported lumber and is estimated to increase about 25 percent the excise tax, which is the tax unscrupulous candidates for Congress falsely accuse me of voting to reduce. April 4, 1938, Henry Bahr, counsel for the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, wrote me as follows:

Regarding your amendment of the lumber import excise tax, which was tacked on to the revenue bill in the Ways and Means Committee and retained by the Senate last week, I am sure Colonel Greeley must have told you how sincerely we appreciate your helpful cooperation in this matter.

Candidates of the opposite party should be asked by the voters why their party under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930 and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922 left lumber and shingles on the duty-free list, without any import excise tax or quota limitation, and provided 100 percent free trade with Canada. Such an explanation, if any, would be interesting, probably amusing.

PULP LEGISLATION

I am the author of H. R. 7312, the Smith bill, to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921, to plug up and curtail importations of foreign pulp in competition with our local product. This bill has received wide support from the pulp and sulphite workers' unions and the manufacturers. It has strong support in Congress. The United States Pulp Producers Association, O. M. Porter, has written me, as follows:

I am very glad to be able to tell you that the executive committee of this association has instructed me to do everything possible toward developing Nation-wide support of your bill (H. R. 7312) to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921.

The changed conditions suddenly caused by the invasion of the Scandinavian countries and removal temporarily of competition from that quarter has deferred immediate action, but the legislation is in fine shape for consideration in the next Congress.

PEELER LOG LEGISLATION

Past national administrations have permitted the exporting of peeler logs without hindrance so many years that now this, too, has created a problem to deal with. This has nothing to do with the reciprocal-trade agreements, which have made no change whatsoever. The question is simply one of whether we should limit the export of raw materials, the supply of which is becoming limited on account of our generosity in the past, which we now need for our own domestic use and manufacture by our own labor. I have vigorously favored the enactment of this legislation, which presents difficulties because it establishes a new precedent. Past neglect always renders application of the remedy difficult. The outlook for the enactment of this legislation in the near future is favorable on account of the hearings which have been held and the efforts which have been put forth in its behalf by the entire Washington congressional delegation. On May 24, 1940, Mr. Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, with which plywood manufacturers in southwest Washington are affiliated, wrote me:

The board of directors held its annual meeting on May 21 and I was directed to express to you the board's appreciation of the valuable assistance which you have given in the peeler-log matter.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION—CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The National Youth Administration has made a splendid record in the State of Washington and many young men and women in my district have greatly benefited from the program. Through the office of Mr. John H. Binns, Washington State Administrator of the N. Y. A., I have obtained official figures on the out-of-school program and the school-work program which reflect the actual earnings of the young people. However, the figures on the college-work program do not take into account students living in my district but attending college elsewhere. There are, of course, a great many young men and women from southwest Washington at the University of Washington, Washington State College, and elsewhere, and they are receiving their full share of the college-work funds. In Mason County a total of 18 young men and women have participated in the out-of-school work program, receiving total monthly earnings of $270. Two Shelton schools are included in the school-work program, with a total of 43 student workers and a total yearly quota of $1,350.

The useful and constructive work performed by the young men in the C. C. C. camps has received universal praise. In my district in addition to building trails, roads, bridges, the prevention of floods and soil erosion, and other public improvements, their services in effectively fighting forest fires has resulted in a saving of millions of dollars. The young men themselves have benefited greatly from the training and instruction which they have received, and, of course, their own compensation and the allotments to their dependents have provided added purchasing power. The expenditures for materials and supplies in the vicinity of the camps have been a direct benefit to numerous business firms and merchants. C. C. C. camps have been in operation in practically every county in my district and the entire State of Washington.

AMERICA FOREVER—COMMUNISM, FASCISM, NAZI-ISM NEVER

On June 22, 1940, I voted for H. R. 5138, the most thorough and far-reaching revision of our immigration and deportation laws in the past 25 years. It is directed against all subversive, "fifth column," and un-American activities and provides punishment for those who attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. H. R. 5138, as amended, was carefully considered and provides effective remedies against all foreign "isms" without violating our Constitution and American traditions.

My friends, we have the finest country and the best Government on earth. Let us keep them that way. There is no room in America for communism, fascism, nazi-ism. There is room for only one "ism," and that is Americanism. We are going to keep America out of Europe and we are going to keep Europe out of America.

My Report to the People of Wahkiakum County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my established practice, I hereby render my report and account of my official record to the citizens of Wahkiakum County.

I agree with the many thousands of citizens who have written to me that our first task remains that of keeping our country out of war. I shall continue my vigorous support of neutrality legislation. We are the only neutral nation in the world whose ships and citizens have not been attacked.

I shall cooperate vigorously in supporting President Roosevelt's national-defense program, and am remaining at my post of duty in order to do so.

May I take this opportunity to sincerely thank my fellow citizens for their kind expressions of approval of my work in Congress; their generous letters have been a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Influence in Congress depends upon seniority of service on important committees. Why throw away the influence of seniority and experience? What do candidates have to offer except their own personal ambition? I now rank sixth out of a membership of 27 on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, having started at the bottom of the ladder in 1933. As a direct result, we have had more regular worthy river and harbor, jetty, and flood control projects approved and carried out in southwest Washington during my period of service than during the entire previous history of our State. It is also my privilege to be chairman of the Pensions Committee, which gives me added rank and prestige in the House. I also am serving on the important Committee on Education, vital to the students and faculties in our public schools and colleges, and on the Indian Affairs and War Claims Committees.

When politicians are desperate they sometimes resort to issues of the most trivial and amusing nature, and this year for the first time, the Congressman's county of legal residence is seemingly being made such an issue.

I have been a permanent resident of southwest Washington for 30 years and have been continuously visiting all the communities in the district and am, therefore, thoroughly familiar with conditions and problems in every community. However, length of residence in the district is important, for a comparative newcomer from a distant part of the State could not be expected to know our people nor our problems and would consequently not be qualified to represent our interests effectively.

The particular city or county in which the Congressman resides has absolutely no bearing on his effectiveness to serve his district, which depends on his length of service, his rank, and his experience.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, who is retiring after 24 years in Congress, paid a tribute the other day to the seasoned Members of the House.

The rest of the States, he said, should follow the example of Texas, in reelecting its Congressmen, then they would control more committee chairmanships. Texas, with 21 Members in the House today holds 5 chairmanships, he pointed out. It is exceeded only by New York with 6 out of its 45 Members holding committee chairmanships. The Texas Congressman ended by quoting former Speaker Champ Clark:

A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

IMPROVED BUSINESS CONDITIONS

The steady improvement in business conditions and recovery from the depths of 1929–33 continue.

I shall never forget the gloom and despair of the merchants, laborers, fishermen, and farmers in 1932 when I visited Cathlamet, Puget Island, Skamokawa, Rosburg, Deep River, Grays River, and all the communities of Wahkiakum County. There were hardly any jobs or money in circulation—prices were down, and there was no market. Conditions are vastly different now and we are far better situated than we were then.

GOVERNMENT AID AND COOPERATION

Not only has this beneficial change been wrought, but our Government has also aided and cooperated in the construction of many worth-while projects which make our local communities better places in which to live.

PUGET ISLAND BRIDGE

On March 27, 1934, I introduced the first Puget Island Bridge bill in Congress and continued the struggle until on September 15, 1937, I secured the P. W. A. allotment of $225,000 from the Federal Government to supplement the contributions of the State of Washington and Wahkiakum County. Finally, on August 26, 1939, the magnificent new span across the Columbia River from Puget Island to Cathlamet was dedicated and the dream of the late Sivert Olson and countless other pioneers was realized. It was a long, hard fight which was won only through the untiring and unselfish efforts of hundreds of fine citizens, civic organizations, and public officials, among whom I am happy and proud to be included.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

During the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, there was expended by the Federal Government in Wahkiakum County the sum of $833,003, and loaned therein the additional sum of $117,648, a total of $950,651.

Flood control, school, road, street, park, community building, courthouse improvement projects have been provided and will constitute valuable community assets for many years to come and serve future generations as well as our own.

MY PROGRESSIVE LABOR RECORD

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress, I have supported and voted for every piece of legislation of benefit to labor. I realize that our business prosperity is measured by the income and wages received by labor and agriculture. I have, therefore, supported their reasonable demands 100 percent. We have conferred upon labor the same right as that enjoyed by their employers, namely, to bargain collectively in regard to wages, working hours, and working conditions. I have had the active support of every branch of organized labor and the railroad brotherhoods ever since I have been a Member of Congress and intend to continue to merit and deserve their support in the future as I have in the past. I have likewise heartily supported all legislation designed to accord to our Federal and postal workers more liberal treatment. They serve the public faithfully and efficiently and should be treated accordingly.

Instead of paying our veterans in bullets, tear bombs, and poison gas, the way the bonus army was "paid," we paid in cash in 1936 the bonus which had been delinquent since 1924. Veterans in Wahkiakum County thus received $84,183.88.

I have sponsored two bills familiar to every Spanish War veteran, the Smith bill of 1935 paying their pensions in full and the Philippine travel pay bill of 1940, as well as numerous other measures for hospitalization, increased benefits, and so forth.

I have favored every bill in the interests of the veterans of the World War, their widows and dependents which has come before Congress, and am nationally known for my active support of veterans' legislation. FEDERAL HOUSING—HOME OWNERS LOAN—BANK DEPOSITS

As one of the five Members of the House who conferred with President Roosevelt March 20, 1934, and sponsored the first housing legislation in Congress, I am gratified at the benefits which have accrued therefrom to our people. In Wahkiakum County a $2,000 loan has been made.

I actively supported the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act, and am glad that five citizens of Wahkiakum County have received loans aggregating $5,684.72. I expressed my belief in this legislation on April 28, 1933, in these words:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to render available the sum of $2,000,000,000 to restore, redeem, rehabilitate, and save the homes of many of the American people, and Mr. Speaker, when we save the homes of the American people, we save America.

Depositors in the Wahkiakum County bank have their deposits up to $5,000 insured by the Federal Government under the acts of Congress, which I heartily supported and voted for. I am happy and proud that the Roosevelt administration has provided this protection and security for our people, and that it has been my privilege to have a humble part in bringing about this great reform which should have been introduced many years ago.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

As an active member of the House Committee on Education, I have vigorously favored providing in public works and relief appropriation bills adequate funds to aid in paying the salaries of school teachers and maintain, repair, and improve our public-school buildings, as well as institutions of higher learning, as I consider the cause of public education and the recommendations of our parent-teacher associations to be paramount.

Seventh. Such of the allied purposes as may serve the best interests of the teachers and pupils and the P. T. A. in making the public schools a more effective, far reaching and American force in local, State, and national life.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

I have been an ardent, outspoken advocate of old-age pensions during my service in Congress. I have continued the interest which as a veteran member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles I have manifested for the past 25 years. I have on every occasion promptly signed every petition to bring old-age pension and general welfare legislation before the Congress for action.

FARM LEGISLATION

The farm problem is recognized as the most difficult with which we have to deal, having been acute since 1920. We have done more for the farmer than any previous national administration and have since 1932 doubled our farm income. We have recaptured our lost foreign export trade in agricultural products without sacrificing our home markets, and should you desire the official Government statistics bearing on this entire subject, please write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., or write to me and I shall be glad to obtain them for you. Self-seeking politicans running for office do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the facts. Therefore, if you are interested in ascertaining the true facts, I shall be glad to assist you in doing so. We have not entirely solved the farm problem, but we have made more progress toward a solution than any previous national administration.

The condition of the farmer everywhere is much better than it was in 1932, when his prices and market were the worst in the history of American agriculture. Think back to 1932 and compare the lot of the average farmer in your own neighborhood as it was then with his condition today in 1940 and you will realize this fact. We intend to keep on helping the farmer. It remains my opinion that the Grange cost-of-production plan, to insure the farmer parity prices with industry, offers the best solution of the farm problem. In the next Congress I shall again vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture and would be glad to have you verify this fact by writing to Mr. Ervin E. King, master of the Washington State Grange, 3104 Western Avenue, Seattle, Wash., or Mr. Fred Breckman, legislative representative, National Grange, 1343 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES

One of the most important enterprises which can be encouraged by the Federal Government is the developing, propagating and conserving of our fish and game resources. I have therefore at all times cooperated with the House Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources and the various pogy, wildlife, sportsmen's, game, and rod and gun clubs and associations in southwest Washington. I voted for the Robertson-Pittman Act last year and the appropriation this year of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. The Federal contribution to our State is estimated at $60,575, to be matched by the State contributing $20,191.66, a total of $80,766.66. I have actively cooperated in obtaining W. P. A. and Federal funds for fish hatcheries, fish ponds, and fish and game preserves and wildlife projects in southwest Washington.

I have given prompt attention to the requests received from the holders of fish and game licenses in southwest Washington for information regarding the Federal laws and pending legislation relating to the subject of wildlife.

BONNEVILLE—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

I am proud of my sponsorship of the $70,000,000 Bonneville project and rural-electrification projects, and shall exert every effort to bring their benefits to all our citizens.

LUMBER, SHINGLES, PULP, PLYWOOD INDUSTRIES

During my entire service in Congress, on every occasion without a single exception, I have supported and voted for beneficial legislation desired by the lumber, shingle, pulp, and plywood industry and advantageous to their workers, and have at all times extended to them my wholehearted cooperation. Self-seeking politicians apparently have no scruples in misrepresenting the facts. Therefore, if you wish to verify my statement in regard to my official record, I would suggest that you write to the official legislative representatives of the organizations to which our local industries belong: Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager, West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 364 Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., 340 White-Henry-Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; Henry Bahr, counsel, National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, 1337 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C.; Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, Tacoma Building, Tacoma, Wash.; O. M. Porter, secretary, United States Pulp Producers' Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

In the general election 2 years ago, in 1938, my Republican opponent had the nerve to display a bundle of shingles and talk about protection for shingles. At that time, and for 5 years previously, the shingle industry and workers enjoyed a 25-percent quota, the only protection in 25 years. The Republicans kept shingles on the duty-free list for 25 years, without any quota, causing Senator HOMER T. BONE in the campaign in 1932 to say:

The shingle industry was ruined because of this fact.

In the period since I took my seat in Congress in 1933 the shingle industry has been revived, old mills remodeled and equipped with new machinery, and new mills built, until now we have three times as many plants and number of shingle weavers employed as in 1932.

November 18, 1935, Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

I hasten to send you this brief note to thank you for the fine help we received from you in our fight to secure the import quota on Canadian shingles. I want to express to you my appreciation of your efforts in our behalf.

To render the quota more effective, I introduced the bill which became law for a census of the shingle industry. On May 27, 1937, Mr. McGrath wrote, when President Roosevelt signed my bill:

This news is about the most important that has come to red-cedar shingle manufacturers and the logging and lumber operators associated with the shingle business.

February 1, 1938, the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

At the annual membership meeting of this association, held in Tacoma February 1, 1938, a resolution was unanimously approved instructing the secretary to write you expressing the gratitude of this association for your faithful services in our behalf in connection with the import limitations on red cedar shingles.

On November 2, 1938, the following news article was published in the Hoquiam Washingtonian:

SHINGLE WEAVERS COMMEND SMITH

A resolution endorsing MARTIN F. SMITH in his campaign for reelection to Congress was passed this week by Grays Harbor Shingle Weavers, Local 2576. The resolution endorsing SMITH is being sent to all shingle weaver unions in the district council. The resolution commends Congressman SMITH for diligent work in limiting importation of Canadian shingles into the United States.

In this Congress I have actively cooperated in efforts to secure aid for the workers and the shingle industry. Following vigorous efforts before the State Department and Ways and Means Committee, we have recently secured the passage of a bill providing for a duty of 25 cents per square on red-cedar shingles imported from Canada, the first duty imposed in 29 years. On June 28, 1940, David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

The final passage of our shingle bill in the Senate on June 22 brings to a conclusion the long struggle to put shingles back on the duty list. To say that we are pleased, expresses our feeling very mildly.

Having full knowledge of the difficulty of getting a tariff bill through Congress, and particularly one giving protection to the shingle or lumber industries, we are grateful for the continuous thought and effort you have given our affairs.

All during the struggle, since January 1, it has been heartening to know that you were tirelessly working for the passage of our shingle bill and it has been of great value to the writer to be able to confer with you at any time when a conference was deemed necessary. You have been on the job for us and we are very appreciative.

With best wishes for your continued success, we remain,

Yours truly,

UNITED STATES RED CEDAR SHINGLE INDUSTRY, INC.,
By DAVID M. WILLIAMS,
Secretary-Manager.

I would suggest that when candidates of the opposing party talk about shingles that citizens ask them about the do-nothing record of their party for 25 years, and the do-something record of the Roosevelt administration and request an explanation. I would appreciate citizens writing me briefly what explanation, if any, they give. I am curious, as you must be, after reading the foregoing recital of fact, to know what alibi and excuse they have to offer.

The lumber business is the best it has been in 10 years. Last year pay rolls and wages in private industry were the highest in the history of the State.

A candidate for Congress should have respect for the voters and for the office he is seeking. What about the candidate who deliberately circulates malicious falsehoods? Two years ago and again this year the same falsehood is being circulated and published that Members of Congress from our State, including myself, voted to reduce the excise tax on lumber. The best answer to this campaign lie was made December 12, 1938, by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager and legislative representative of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, of which our local lumber firms are members:

The west coast lumber industry has had the effective and loyal support of Mr. SMITH on every occasion when we have been asking for his help. He has voted for renewal of the excise tax on imported lumber on every occasion when the matter has been before Congress. He has supported our efforts to have lumber properly defined for taxing purposes, as in the classification of large timbers and with withdrawal of allowances for planing and milling. He has helped us in every question arising for the clarification and administration of the excise tax.

The West Coast Lumbermen's Association keeps wholly out of politics. I just want, as a matter of fairness, to point out that Mr. SMITH has been a very loyal and conscientious supporter of the interests of the lumber industry since he entered Congress. I feel it only square that this fact be made known.

Sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Secretary-Manager.

My amendment of the lumber import excise tax, known as the Smith amendment, introduced as H. R. 7934, was attached to the Revenue Act in 1938 and passed the Senate, was approved by President Roosevelt and became law. It prevents deductions for tonguing, planing, and grooving of imported lumber and is estimated to increase about 25 percent the excise tax, which is the tax unscrupulous candidates for Congress falsely accuse me of voting to reduce. April 4, 1938, Henry Bahr, counsel for the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, wrote me, as follows:

Regarding your amendment of the lumber import excise tax, which was tacked on to the revenue bill in the Ways and Means Committee and retained by the Senate last week, I am sure Colonel Greeley must have told you how sincerely we appreciate your helpful cooperation in this matter.

Candidates of the opposite party should be asked by the voters why their party, under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930 and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922, left lumber and shingles on the duty-free list, without any import excise tax or quota limitation, and provided 100-percent free trade with Canada. Such an explanation, if any, would be interesting, probably amusing.

PULP LEGISLATION

I am the author of H. R. 7312, the Smith bill, to amend the Anti-Dumping Act of 1921, to plug up and curtail importations of foreign pulp in competition with our local product. This bill has received wide support from the pulp and sulphite workers unions and the manufacturers. It has strong support in Congress. The United States Pulp Producers Association, O. M. Porter, has written me as follows:

I am very glad to be able to tell you that the executive committee of this association has instructed me to do everything possible toward developing Nation-wide support of your bill (H. R 7312) to amend the Anti-Dumping Act of 1921.

The changed conditions suddenly caused by the invasion of the Scandinavian countries and removal temporarily of competition from that quarter has deferred immediate action, but the legislation is in fine shape for consideration in the next Congress.

PEELER LOG LEGISLATION

Past national administrations have permitted the exporting of peeler logs without hindrance so many years that now this, too, has created a problem to deal with. This has nothing to do with the reciprocal-trade agreements, which have made no change whatsoever. The question is simply one of whether we should limit the export of raw materials, the supply of which is becoming limited on account of our generosity in the past, which we now need for our own domestic use and manufacture by our own labor. I have vigorously favored the enactment of this legislation, which presents difficulties because it establishes a new precedent. Past neglect always renders application of the remedy difficult. The outlook for the enactment of this legislation in the near future is favorable on account of the hearings which have been held and the efforts which have been put forth in its behalf by the entire Washington congressional delegation. On May 24, 1940, Mr. Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, with which plywood manufacturers in southwest Washington are affiliated, wrote me:

The board of directors held its annual meeting on May 21, and I was directed to express to you the board's appreciation of the valuable assistance which you have given in the peeler log matter.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION—CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The National Youth Administration has made a splendid record in the State of Washington and many young men and women in my district have greatly benefited from the program. Through the office of Mr. John H. Binns, Washington State administrator of the N. Y. A., I have obtained official figures on the out-of-school program and the school-work program which reflect the actual earnings of the young people. However, the figures on the college-work program do not take into account students living in my district but attending college elsewhere. There are, of course, a great many young men and women from southwest Washington at the University of Washington, Washington State College, and elsewhere, and they are receiving their full share of the college-work funds. In Wahkiakum County a total of 7 young men and women have participated in the out-of-school work program, receiving total monthly earnings of $105. There have been 10 Wahkiakum County young people in the school-work program at Cathlamet, with a total yearly quota of $432.

The useful and constructive work performed by the young men in the C. C. C. camps has received universal praise. In my district, in addition to building trails, roads, bridges, the prevention of floods and soil erosion, and other public improvements, their services in effectively fighting forest fires has resulted in a saving of millions of dollars. The young men themselves have benefited greatly from the training and instruction which they have received, and, of course, their own compensation and the allotments to their dependents have provided added purchasing power. The expenditures for materials and supplies in the vicinity of the camps have been a direct benefit to numerous business firms and merchants. C. C. C. Camps have been in operation in practically every county in my district and the entire State of Washington.

AMERICA FOREVER—COMMUNISM, FASCISM, NAZI-ISM NEVER

On June 22, 1940, I voted for H. R. 5138, the most thorough and far-reaching revision of our immigration and deportation laws in the past 25 years. It is directed against all subversive, fifth column, and un-American activities, and provides punishment for those who attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. H. R. 5138 as amended was carefully considered and provides effective remedies against all foreign isms without violating our Constitution and American traditions.

My friends, we have the finest country and best Government on earth. Let us keep them that way. There is no room in America for communism, fascism, nazi-ism. There is room for only one ism and that is Americanism. We are going to keep America out of Europe and we are going to keep Europe out of America.

The Draft Bill Should Be Defeated

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent now that the draft bill now before the Senate will not reach the House for several days—maybe weeks, and I take this occasion while the bill is not pending before us to extend my remarks on the subject under leave previously obtained.

This Nation should prepare to defend itself, but to put two million men in training to use a gun will do about as much good as to attempt to grow feathers on a fish. Wars are not fought these days with men with guns to their hands. Wars are fought with war machines. To destroy the enemy electricity and scientific contrivances now take the place of men. A million men armed with the latest improved rifles are helpless before a fleet of modern tanks. In Europe today the old-time foot soldier is used almost entirely for police duty after the country is overrun with tanks and pounded flat with air bombs.

We need to draft our young men in the study of sciences. If our object is to fight a defensive war if necessary, then let us prepare to defend. If the French had invented some contrivance that would have stopped the German tanks, France would still be France. Her millions of men armed and trained in the use of small weapons proved to be no defense at all. The French spent their money building concrete lines of defense instead of building and equipping a movable defense on the ground and in the air.

We do not need any draft program to train our men for a complete defense. We need engines on the ground and in the air and on and under the sea, and experts to man them. Can we draft airplane operators? No country on earth has such a program. Germany does not draft men to operate planes. Every pilot is a volunteer, and he is selected only when his peculiar fitness for the job is apparent.

We do not need any draft to train skilled operators of war machines. There will be more volunteers than we can or will select.

We do not need a draft to train our men in the sciences of peace or war and after all it is science that makes a war machine powerful.

If we knew that war was certain to come to this country, the kind of defense we need is a scientific defense, and not a defense of a mass of men carrying small arms. The draft will not supply what we need.

Again, there is no immediate danger of any war in this country. Hysteria has been whipped up to a glaring flame in many parts of the country to such an extent that many private citizens are buying guns to either carry with them or have in a handy place. This is propaganda to bring on a war. None of the war machines of Europe has any chance, and probably have no idea, of attacking the Western Hemisphere. Countries like Italy and Germany will be so busy fighting famine during the next 3 years that they will not have the power to strike across 3,000 miles of water. It is becoming more apparent every hour that Germany will exhaust herself in trying to invade England, only 9 minutes away by air.

There is no immediate danger of our having to fight any defensive war in the Western Hemisphere—at least for 3 years. In the meantime let us prepare to do some defending. We can train men in the skilled performance of defensive weapons of the kind that will defend against any machine yet contrived, or which is apt to be contrived within the next 3 years. We must keep ahead in science and improvement and inventions. But far more important than all this is to prepare the mass of our people for safe defense. We must put the idle to work; we must stop the foreclosures and dispossessions of home owners; we must take special privilege away from those who have it and grant equality to all. This Government must take possession of its money and credit and use it for all the people, and immediately stop the use of our funds and credit by private individuals for their own profit.

Just remember that capitalism is on trial throughout the world. Capitalism has been blind—it is blind in this country today. It will not stop and observe the handwriting on the wall. Capitalism is being abolished in the world at a terrific rate. The complete abolishment of capitalism means the destruction of individual liberty of action. Our problem here, if we wish to preserve individual liberty, is to make capitalism work in the interest of the mass of the American people. If we cannot make it work, then we shall follow in the wake of the total destruction of capitalism.

In this country right now capitalism should of its own motion amend its practices and deal out more of the combined profits of capital and labor to labor. Heretofore capitalism has kept too much of the joint venture until there are a few too rich and too many too poor. Capitalism has gained this advantage through special privilege—I mean acts of State legislatures and Congress in granting them special advantages.

Right now at this very moment capitalism is determined to rule the people—a movement is now in motion to defeat every progressive-minded official in the United States and replace them with men and women who will bow subserviently to the wishes of large capital groups.

Our job is to oppose this blind program of capitalism and establish some semblance of equality in this country by law. The law permitted the growth of organized capital and the law can stop it. For example, we do not need to pay any interest on the public debt, and with the elimination of that interest the interest system operating on private individuals will be reduced. When we contemplate that it takes all of the entire income annually of the farms and of the laboring class to pay the annual interest on our debt—public and private—we can gain some picture of the devastation this interest-taking dragon has taken and is taking from the American people.

The result of this system is now seen in idle people, hungry people, ragged people, homeless people. Do you want that to continue? Can you defend this country with homeless soldiers? Can you defend this country against an enemy which promises to destroy this interest-taking system? The unbridled reign of capitalism can continue until there will be no one left to defend what remains of this Republic.

If this draft law is passed it will not in the slightest degree make us more able to defend ourselves against the engines of modern war. It will degrade our people and unjustly charge them with being unwilling to volunteer to fight for their country. Our first job is to make this country worth defending—make this country in fact what the Declaration of Independence declared—where every citizen shall have the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. If we will do that, millions will come forward to fight in the defense of that Government. To turn home owners out of their homes, to allow millions to walk the streets for a job and shelter, and before we correct the situation to reach out with the arm of the law and drag these citizens into training camps against their will, can have no other effect than to make a bad situation worse. We ought not to do it; we ought not to attempt it.

The directors of capitalism in America should get right down and think—if they can be assumed to have that power—and give up themselves, without any law, the selfishness that they have heretofore enjoyed. Capitalism should learn to serve the people, not exploit them. Then and only then will capitalism be preserved, and with it individual liberty. If capitalism remains blind to its own errors and refuses to recede from its unwarranted grasp upon the necessities of the American people, it will be destroyed, and, worst of all, individual liberty will be destroyed with it.

That situation is more to be feared than all the combined armies of Europe. Let this Government do the right thing by the mass of the people and the mass of the people will defend the Government against all enemies to their last breath.

Mr. Speaker, this draft law should be defeated.

My Report to the People of Skamania County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my established practice, I hereby render my report and account of my official record to the citizens of Skamania County.

I agree with the many thousands of citizens who have written to me that our first task remains that of keeping our country out of war. I shall continue my vigorous support of neutrality legislation. We are the only neutral nation in the world whose ships and citizens have not been attacked.

I shall cooperate vigorously in supporting President Roosevelt's national defense program, and am remaining at my post of duty in order to do so.

May I take this opportunity to sincerely thank my fellow citizens for their kind expressions of approval of my work in Congress—their generous letters have been a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Influence in Congress depends upon seniority of service on important committees. Why throw away the influence of seniority and experience? What do candidates have to offer except their own personal ambition? I now rank sixth out of a membership of 27 on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, having started at the bottom of the ladder in 1933. As a direct result, we have had more regular worthy river and harbor, jetty and flood-control projects approved and carried out in southwest Washington during my period of service than during the entire previous history of our State. It is also my privilege to be chairman of the Pensions Committee, which gives me added rank and prestige in the House. I also am serving on the important Committee on Education, vital to the students and faculties in our public schools and colleges, and on the Indian Affairs and War Claims Committees.

When politicians are desperate they sometimes resort to issues of the most trivial and amusing nature, and this year for the first time the Congressman's county of legal residence is seemingly being made such an issue.

I have been a permanent resident of southwest Washington for 30 years and have been continuously visiting all the communities in the district and am, therefore, thoroughly familiar with conditions and problems in every community. However, length of residence in the district is important, for a comparative newcomer from a distant part of the State could not be expected to know our people nor our problems and would consequently not be qualified to represent our interests effectively.

The particular city or county in which the Congressman resides has absolutely no bearing on his effectiveness to serve his district, which depends on his length of service, his rank, and his experience.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, who is retiring after 24 years in Congress, paid a tribute the other day to the seasoned Members of the House.

The rest of the States, he said, should follow the example of Texas in reelecting its Congressmen, then they would control more committee chairmanships. Texas, with 21 Members in the House today holds 5 chairmanships, he pointed out. It is exceeded only by New York with 6 out of its 45 Members holding committee chairmanships. The Texas Congressman ended by quoting former Speaker Champ Clark:

A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

IMPROVED BUSINESS CONDITIONS

The steady improvement in business conditions and recovery from the depths of 1929–33 continues.

I shall never forget the gloom and despair of the storekeepers, laborers, and farmers in 1932 when I visited Stevenson, what is now North Bonneville, Carson, Underwood, Cape Horn, and all the communities of Skamania County. There were hardly any jobs or money in circulation—prices were down and there was no market. Conditions are vastly different now and we are far better situated than we were then.

GOVERNMENT AID AND COOPERATION

Not only has this beneficial change been wrought but our Government has also aided and cooperated in the construction of many worth-while projects which make our local communities better places in which to live.

BONNEVILLE—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

I shall always be proud of my sponsorship of the original legislation creating the great Bonneville $70,000,000 project and my active participation during the years in every step to bring its benefits to the citizens and communities of Skamania County and our district. On March 4, 1938, the late John D. Ross, Administrator of the Bonneville project, wrote me:

I wish to express my deep appreciation of your efforts in obtaining the Bonneville appropriation through the House. The cooperation which I received while in Washington and since I left has pleased me very much.

Bonneville will always remain a monument to the memory of this sturdy champion of public power for all the people.

On March 27, 1939, Charles E. Carey, Acting Administrator, wrote me:

With friends like you in Congress, we feel that the future of Bonneville is in safe hands. We will do everything we can to see that your friends in southwestern Washington are fully advised of your service and active support of the Bonneville project.

In this session of Congress I appeared twice before the Appropriations Committee and testified at length in support of increased appropriations this year, which we succeeded in obtaining so the work can continue unabated.

Under date of June 20, 1940, Dr. Paul J. Raver, Administrator, Bonneville Power Administration, wrote me:

I want to express my appreciation for the very able assistance which you gave this Administration in connection with our request for an appropriation sufficient to meet our construction needs to get the power from the Bonneville Dam to the market areas.

I have actively supported our rural electrification projects which are, of course, valuable adjuncts to Bonneville.

PROPOSED STEVENSON POST OFFICE

My bill for a post-office building for Stevenson is in a favorable position. Its actual construction will depend upon the progress of the new public building program. The latter is temporarily deferred owing to the emergency national defense program.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

During the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, there was expended by the Federal Government in Skamania County the sum of $1,200,222, and loaned therein the additional sum of $114,191, a total of $1,314,413.

School, road, street, park, water-system, community-building, sanitation projects have been provided and will constitute valuable community assets for many years to come and serve future generations as well as our own.

MY PROGRESSIVE LABOR RECORD

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress, I have supported and voted for every piece of legislation of benefit to labor. I realize that our business prosperity is measured by the income and wages received by labor and agriculture. I have, therefore, supported their reasonable demands 100 percent. We have conferred upon labor the same right as that enjoyed by their employers, viz, to bargain collectively in regard to wages, working hours, and working conditions. I have had the active support of every branch of organized labor and the railroad brotherhoods ever since I have been a Member of Congress, and intend to continue to merit and deserve their support in the future as I have in the past. I have likewise heartily supported all legislation designed to accord to our Federal and postal workers more liberal treatment. They serve the public faithfully and efficiently and should be treated accordingly.

WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

For 4 years I served as a member of the steering committee of 22 House Members, which led the successful fight for the soldiers' bonus. Instead of paying our veterans in bullets, tear bombs, and poison gas, the way the bonus army was "paid," we paid in cash in 1936 the bonus which had been delinquent since 1924. Veterans in Skamania County thus received $63,018.02.

I have sponsored two bills familiar to every Spanish War veteran, the Smith bill of 1935 paying their pensions in full and the Philippine travel pay bill of 1940, as well as numerous other measures for hospitalization, increased benefits, and so forth.

I have favored every bill in the interests of the veterans of the World War, their widows, and dependents which has come before Congress and am nationally known for my active support of veterans' legislation. I shall continue this policy, for it is my firm belief that it is the solemn duty and sacred obligation of our Government never to forget but always to remember and to compensate to the fullest possible extent those who have defended our Republic. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have always received from the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United Spanish War Veterans, the Disabled American Veterans, and their auxiliaries.

FEDERAL HOUSING—HOME OWNERS' LOAN—BANK DEPOSITS

As one of the five Members of the House who conferred with President Roosevelt March 20, 1934, and sponsored the first housing legislation in Congress, I am gratified at the benefits which have accrued therefrom to our people. In Skamania County five citizens have received loans aggregating $9,200 for the construction, modernization, and repair of their homes. This has been of vast benefit to the workers in the building trades, including electricians, painters, and plumbers, and the lumber, plywood, shingle, and other allied industries.

I actively supported the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act and am glad that three citizens of Skamania County have received loans aggregating $3,312.64. I expressed my belief in this legislation on April 28, 1933, in these words:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to render available the sum of $2,000,000,000 to restore, redeem, rehabilitate, and save the homes of many of the American people, and, Mr. Speaker, when we save the homes of the American people we save America.

Depositors in the Bank of Stevenson have their deposits up to $5,000 insured by the Federal Government under the acts of Congress which I heartily supported and voted for. I am happy and proud that the Roosevelt administration has provided this protection and security for our people and that it has been my privilege to have a humble part in bringing about this great reform, which should have been introduced many years ago.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

As an active member of the House Committee on Education, I have vigorously favored providing in public works and relief appropriation bills adequate funds to aid in paying the salaries of school teachers and maintain, repair, and improve our public-school buildings, as well as institutions of higher learning, as I consider the cause of public education and the recommendations of our parent-teacher associations to be paramount.

I favor the following program:

First. Adequate free public education for the children of the United States.

Second. Adequate pay for public-school teachers as a matter of justice and as a means of retaining in and attracting to the teaching profession the most competent, devoted, and best-equipped men and women.

Third. An annual minimum of at least 8 months' teaching in the public schools of all the States.

Fourth. An adequate number of safe, commodious, and well-equipped school buildings.

Fifth. Free textbooks for all public-school pupils.

Sixth. Adequate assistance by the Federal Government through appropriations and otherwise in accomplishing the foregoing objects.

Seventh. Such of the allied purposes as may serve the best interests of the teachers and pupils and the P. T. A. in making the public schools a more effective, far-reaching, and American force in local, State, and National life.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

I have been an ardent, outspoken advocate of old-age pensions during my service in Congress. I have continued the interest which as a veteran member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles I have manifested for the past 25 years. I have on every occasion promptly signed every petition to bring old-age pension and general-welfare legislation before the Congress for action.

I was the first Member of Congress to publicly espouse the Townsend plan in 1934 and in a brief 6 years have, as a member of our steering committee, actively participated in the growth of our movement, until today we are approximating a sufficient following in the House of Representatives to enact our legislation in its present form into law. The United States Senate recently, for the first time, authorized a thorough study of the Townsend plan. In view of this progress we confidently expect to reelect a sufficient number of our old supporters and elect a sufficient number of new supporters in the elections this year to enact H. R. 8264 into law in the next Congress.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES

One of the most important enterprises which can be encouraged by the Federal Government is the developing, propagating, and conserving of our fish and game resources. I have therefore at all times cooperated with the House Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources and the various pogy, wildlife, sportsmen's, game, and rod and gun clubs and associations in southwest Washington. I voted for the Robertson-Pittman Act last year and the appropriation this year of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. The Federal contribution to our State is estimated at $60,575, to be matched by the State contributing $20,191.66, a total of $80,766.66. I have actively cooperated in obtaining W. P. A. and Federal funds for fish hatcheries, fish ponds, and fish and game preserves and wildlife projects in southwest Washington.

I have given prompt attention to the requests received from the holders of fish and game licenses in southwest Washington for information regarding the Federal laws and pending legislation relating to the subject of wildlife.

FARM LEGISLATION

The farm problem is recognized as the most difficult with which we have to deal, having been acute since 1920. We have done more for the farmer than any previous national administration and have, since 1932, doubled our farm income. We have recaptured our lost foreign export trade in agricultural products, without sacrificing our home markets, and should you desire the official Government statistics bearing on this entire subject, please write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., or write to me, and I shall be glad to obtain them for you. Self-seeking politicians running for office do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the facts. Therefore, if you are interested in ascertaining the true facts, I shall be glad to assist you in doing so. We have not entirely solved the farm problem but we have made more progress toward a solution than any previous national administration.

The condition of the farmer everywhere is much better than it was in 1932, when his prices and market were the worst in the history of American agriculture. Think back to 1932 and compare the lot of the average farmer in your own neighborhood as it was then with his condition today in 1940, and you will realize this fact. We intend to keep on helping the farmer. It remains my opinion that the Grange cost-of-production plan, to insure the farmer parity prices with industry, offers the best solution of the farm problem. In the next Congress I shall again vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture, and would be glad to have you verify this fact by writing to Mr. Ervin E. King, master of the Washington State Grange, 3104 Western Avenue, Seattle, Wash., or Mr. Fred Breckman, legislative representative, National Grange, 1343 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

LUMBER, SHINGLE, PULP, PLYWOOD INDUSTRIES

During my entire service in Congress on every occasion, without a single exception, I have supported and voted for beneficial legislation desired by the lumber, shingle, pulp, and plywood industries and advantageous to their workers, and have at all times extended to them my wholehearted cooperation. Self-seeking politicians apparently have no scruples in misrepresenting the facts. Therefore, if you wish to verify my statement in regard to my official record, I would suggest that you write to the official legislative representatives of the organizations to which our local industries belong: Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager, West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 364 Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., 340 White-Henry-Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; Henry Bahr, counsel, National Lumber Manufacturers Association, 1337 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C.; Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, Tacoma Building, Tacoma, Wash.; O. M. Porter, secretary, United States Pulp Producers Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

In the general election 2 years ago, in 1938, my Republican opponent had the nerve to display a bundle of shingles and talk about protection for shingles. At that time and for 5 years previously the shingle industry and workers enjoyed a 25-percent quota, the only protection in 25 years. The Republicans kept shingles on the duty-free list for 25 years, without any quota, causing Senator HOMER T. BONE in the campaign in 1932 to say: "The shingle industry was ruined because of this fact."

In the period since I took my seat in Congress in 1933, the shingle industry has been revived, old mills remodeled and equipped with new machinery, and new mills built, until now we have three times as many plants and number of shingle weavers employed as in 1932.

November 18, 1935, Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

I hasten to send you this brief note to thank you for the fine help we received from you in our fight to secure the import quota on Canadian shingles. I want to express to you my appreciation of your efforts in our behalf.

To render the quota more effective, I introduced the bill which became law for a census of the shingle industry. On May 27, 1937, Mr. McGrath wrote, when President Roosevelt signed my bill:

This news is about the most important that has come to red cedar shingle manufacturers and the logging and lumber operators associated with the shingle business.

February 1, 1938, the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

At the annual membership meeting of this association, held in Tacoma, February 1, 1938, a resolution was unanimously approved instructing the secretary to write you expressing the gratitude of this association for your faithful services in our behalf in connection with the import limitations on red cedar shingles.

On November 2, 1938, the following news article was published in the Hoquiam Washingtonian:

SHINGLE WEAVERS COMMEND SMITH

A resolution endorsing MARTIN F. SMITH in his campaign for reelection to Congress was passed this week by Grays Harbor Shingle Weavers, Local 2576. The resolution endorsing SMITH is being sent to all shingle weaver unions in the district council. The resolution commends Congressman SMITH for diligent work in limiting importation of Canadian shingles into the United States.

In this Congress I have actively cooperated in efforts to secure aid for the workers and the shingle industry. Following vigorous efforts before the State Department and Ways and Means Committee, we have recently secured the passage of a bill providing for a duty of 25 cents per square on red cedar shingles imported from Canada, the first duty imposed in 29 years. On June 28, 1940, David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

The final passage of our shingle bill in the Senate on June 22 brings to a conclusion the long struggle to put shingles back on the duty list. To say that we are pleased expresses our feeling very mildly.

Having full knowledge of the difficulty of getting a tariff bill through Congress, and particularly one giving protection to the shingle or lumber industry, we are grateful for the continuous thought and effort you have given our affairs.

All during the struggle, since January 1, it has been heartening to know that you were tirelessly working for the passage of our shingle bill, and it has been of great value to the writer to be able to confer with you at any time when a conference was deemed necessary. You have been on the job for us and we are very appreciative.

With best wishes for your continued success, we remain,

Yours truly,

UNITED STATES RED CEDAR SHINGLE INDUSTRY, INC.,
By DAVID M. WILLIAMS,
Secretary-Manager.

I would suggest that when the candidates of the opposing party talk about shingles that citizens ask them about the do-nothing record of their party for 25 years and the do-something record of the Roosevelt administration and request an explanation. I would appreciate citizens writing me briefly what explanation, if any, they give. I am curious, as you must be, after reading the foregoing recital of facts, to know what alibi and excuse they have to offer.

LUMBER EXCISE TAX

The lumber business is the best it has been in 10 years. Last year pay rolls and wages in private industry were the highest in the history of the State.

A candidate for Congress should have respect for the voters and for the office he is seeking. What about the candidate who deliberately circulates malicious falsehoods? Two years ago and again this year the same falsehood is being circulated and published that Members of Congress from our State, including myself, voted to reduce the excise tax on lumber. The best answer to this campaign lie was made December 12, 1938, by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager and legislative representative of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, of which our local lumber firms are members:

The west coast lumber industry has had the effective and loyal support of Mr. SMITH on every occasion when we have been asking for his help. He has voted for renewal of the excise tax on imported lumber on every occasion when the matter has been before Congress. He has supported our efforts to have lumber properly defined for taxing purposes, as in the classification of large timbers and with withdrawal of allowances for planing and milling. He has helped us in every question arising for the clarification and administration of the excise tax.

The West Coast Lumbermen's Association keeps wholly out of politics. I just want, as a matter of fairness, to point out that Mr. SMITH has been a very loyal and conscientious supporter of the interests of the lumber industry since he entered Congress. I feel it only square that this fact be made known.

Sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Secretary-Manager.

My amendment of the lumber import excise tax, known as the Smith amendment, introduced as H. R. 7934, was attached to the revenue act in 1938 and passed the Senate, was approved by President Roosevelt, and became law. It prevents deductions for tonguing, planing, and grooving of imported lumber and is estimated to increase about 25 percent the excise tax, which is the tax unscrupulous candidates for Congress falsely accuse me of voting to reduce. April 4, 1938, Henry Bahr, counsel for the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, wrote me as follows:

Regarding your amendment of the lumber import excise tax, which was tacked onto the revenue bill in the Ways and Means Committee and retained by the Senate last week, I am sure Colonel Greeley must have told you how sincerely we appreciate your helpful cooperation in this matter.

Candidates of the opposite party should be asked by the voters why their party, under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930 and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922, left lumber and shingles on the duty-free list, without any import excise tax or quota limitation, and provided 100-percent free trade with Canada. Such an explanation, if made, would be interesting; probably amusing.

PULP LEGISLATION

I am the author of H. R. 7312, the Smith bill, to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921, to plug up and curtail importations of foreign pulp in competition with our local product. This bill has received wide support from the Pulp and Sulphite Workers Unions and the manufacturers. It has strong support in Congress. The United States Pulp Producers Association, O. M. Porter, has written me as follows:

I am very glad to be able to tell you that the executive committee of this association has instructed me to do everything possible toward developing Nation-wide support of your bill, H. R. 7312, to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921.

The changed conditions suddenly caused by the invasion of the Scandinavian countries and removal temporarily of competition from that quarter has deferred immediate action, but the legislation is in fine shape for consideration in the next Congress.

PEELER-LOG LEGISLATION

Past national administrations have permitted the exporting of peeler logs without hindrance so many years that now this, too, has created a problem to deal with. This has nothing to do with the reciprocal trade agreements, which have made no change whatsoever. The question is simply one of whether we should limit the export of raw materials, the supply of which is becoming limited on account of our generosity in the past, which we now need for our own domestic use and manufacture by our own labor. I have vigorously favored the enactment of this legislation, which presents difficulties because it establishes a new precedent. Past neglect always renders application of the remedy difficult. The outlook for the enactment of this legislation in the near future is favorable on account of the hearings which have been held and the efforts which have been put forth in its behalf by the entire Washington congressional delegation. On May 24, 1940, Mr. Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, with which plywood manufacturers in southwest Washington are affiliated, wrote me—

The board of directors held its annual meeting on May 21, and I was directed to express to you the board's appreciation of the valuable assistance which you have given in the peeler-log matter.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION—CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The National Youth Administration has made a splendid record in the State of Washington and many young men and women in my district have greatly benefited from the program. Through the office of Mr. John H. Binns, the Washington State administrator of the N. Y. A., I have obtained official figures on the out-of-school program and the school-work program which reflect the actual earnings of the young people. However, the figures on the college-work program do not take into account students living in my district but attending college elsewhere. There are, of course, a great many young men and women from southwest Washington at the University of Washington, Washington State College, and elsewhere, and they are receiving their full share of the college-work funds. In Skamania County a total of 9 young men and women have participated in the out-of-school work program, receiving total monthly earnings of $135. There have been 19 Skamania County young people in the school-work program at Stevenson, with a total yearly quota of $540.

The useful and constructive work performed by the young men in the C. C. C. camps has received universal praise. In my district in addition to building trails, roads, bridges, the prevention of floods and soil erosion, and other public improvements, their services in effectively fighting forest fires has resulted in a saving of millions of dollars. The young men themselves have benefited greatly from the training and instruction which they have received, and, of course, their own compensation and the allotments to their dependents have provided added purchasing power. The expenditures for materials and supplies in the vicinity of the camps have been a direct benefit to numerous business firms and merchants. Civilian Conservation Corps camps have been in operation in practically every county in my district and the entire State of Washington.

AMERICA FOREVER—COMMUNISM, FASCISM, NAZI-ISM NEVER

On June 22, 1940, I voted for H. R. 5138, the most thorough and far-reaching revision of our immigration and deportation laws in the past 25 years. It is directed against all subversive, "fifth column," and un-American activities and provides punishment for those who attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. H. R. 5138 as amended was carefully considered and provides effective remedies against all foreign isms without violating our Constitution and American traditions.

My friends, we have the finest country and best Government on earth. Let us keep them that way. There is no room in America for communism, fascism, nazi-ism. There is room for only one ism and that is Americanism. We are going to keep America out of Europe and we are going to keep Europe out of America.

ARTICLE BY ROBERT HARPER FROM SCRIBNER'S COMMENTATOR

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mr. Robert E. Harper, the brilliant young director of public relations of the American Road Builders' Association, Washington, D. C., which appears in the August 1940 issue of the magazine, Scribner's Commentator:

ROADS FOR DEFENSE

(By Robert Harper)

Road Builder Hitler bound his highway engineers by no limitations. He alone, perhaps, knew that he was building roads for tomorrow's conquest. He was laying the essential foundations for "blitzkriegs" to come. Der Fuehrer was creating split-second mobility for his yet unheralded army on wheels. He was already scheming victories with streamlined tanks, rapid-transit troop trucks, and high-speed cannon on pneumatics. Hitler was calling the shots in advance. He was presupposing the urgency of modern highways for modern warfare. He demanded the best in roads and got better.

The National Socialist Party organized a central road authority immediately after coming into power. This Nazi governmental unit soon launched the construction of a brand-new 4,300-mile system of master motorways. Herr Hitler turned the first spade of dirt in September 1933. By September 1937, 950 miles had been opened to traffic, 1,120 were under construction, 1,150 were approved and ready for construction, and only 1,080 miles of the 4,300 were still awaiting survey. The original project was completed in 1938 and has since been extended to not less than 6,000 miles.

Hitler's highways are constructed for fast-moving, long-distance traffic. They are designed for speeds approximating 100 miles an hour and are completely isolated from all previously existing roads. Built into the German superroad are the safety features long recommended by American highway engineers. The over-all width of the four-lane motorway is 80 feet. It is divided in the center by a 16-foot grass strip that completely separates the opposing streams of traffic. The two-lane roadway on either side is 25 feet wide. There are no railroad grade crossings, no cross-road intersections. All feeder roads overpass the superhighway and connect it with nearby towns that are by-passed at distances of 2 to 4 miles. All curves are superelevated; all surfaces are nonskid. Traffic is controlled at junctions by clearly defined, systematic lay-outs. Vehicles are not allowed to stop, but parking places are provided alongside the motorway. Pedestrians, bicyclists, and animals are excluded.

It is impossible for me to believe that a certain British road historian did not have his fingers crossed in 1938 when he reported, "One is delighted to be able to applaud the peaceful aspects of this work. * * * To be sure, part of the motorways was crowded with motor-borne troops at the time of the Anschluss with Austria; and it has been calculated that in the new army transport lorries 70,000 men can be carried each way per hour." Hitler's highways are as he conceived them. They are military roads. But these are the routes of dictatorial offensive. There are also roads for democratic defense. France and England have their martial highways.

The thoroughfares of the French pointed away from their industrial nerve centers to the bomb-blasted, tank-tortured front. They were packed with democratic resistance that rolls to battle. They were flooded, too, with refugees from the shambles of steam-rollered towns who made pitiful the progress of reinforcements for the pollus in "blitzkrieg" land.

Across the channel, the vehicles of homeland defense race over the roads of the British Isles. England frantically builds the accessories of self-preservation to better brace itself for the impact of the first foreign invasion since the ancient days of William the Conqueror. John Bull's industrial pulse is at top beat. England's manufacturing heart hourly pumps new mechanical transfusions through the nation's motor arteries to the channel fortifications. Sheffield, Leeds, Newcastle, Glasgow, and all the rest rush the accoutrements of modern war down the roads to the coast to roar "hands off" to Adolf the Audacious.

But what about roads for America's defense? In a recent radio broadcast, President Roosevelt said, "In this era of swift, mechanized warfare, we all have to remember that what is modern today and up to date, what is efficient and practical, becomes obsolete and outworn tomorrow." The Chief Executive's statement is no less true of our highway facilities than it is of our Army, Navy, and air essentials. Charles M. Upham, engineer-director of the American Road Builders' Association, Washington, D. C., world-recognized highway authority, gives us some startling figures. There are 100,000 miles of obsolete highway and 22,000 outworn bridges on the primary or main-road system. That's deterioration. Here's a more decadent display. There are 1,100,000 miles of the country road system that have never known improvement. The record is the same for 585,000 miles of the township system and 65,000 of the State network. This adds up to 1,750,000 miles of unimproved, inefficient, impractical American highway. Farm-to-market roads, America's lifelines, constitute 1,685,000 of this total. There are roughly 3,000,000 miles of roadway in the whole United States system.

Why are these cardinal facts? Why are highways vital to competent national defense? Let's listen to the military experts. General Pershing said, "The country road will be of tremendous value in time of war. The roads must be relied upon to obtain needed food supplies." In normal times big-city markets receive more than 50 percent of their fresh-fruit and vegetable supply via motor truck. The American metropolis receives 90 percent of its milk by way of the highway. Sixty percent of the Nation's livestock tonnage goes to market over the rubber-tired route. This peacetime demand will be trebled in wartime. Add to this highway use the movement of mechanized armies and America's insufficient roads will be hopelessly entangled within 24 hours.

Lieut. Col. Russell P. Hartle, War Plans Division of the War Department, told United States House Roads Committee members, "Movement is essential in war and, save for the deployed movements of a few arms in battle, must take place on roads or railroads. War can be conducted without railroads, but not without roads. Even the battle, if important enough to call for the use of combined arms, must take place where there are roads. Both strategical and tactical plans are limited by roads, because freedom of maneuver depends upon their number, quality, location, and direction. Two streams of traffic flow parallel, steadily and opposite in direction during war, one of filled vehicles and fresh men flowing toward the front, the other of empty vehicles and the wreckage of war flowing toward the rear."

Recent United States Army maneuvers in east Texas and Louisiana proved that only 25 percent of the roads used are comparable to the military-purpose highway standard set by the War Department. Roads of lower-type construction were totally unfit to carry even the lightest motorized Army equipment. Normal traffic was constantly disturbed and congested. A similar situation in wartime, with civilians in retreat as troops and supplies move over the roads to the front, will be disastrous.

To prepare the roads for Army maneuvers, the highway department resurfaced certain paved roads determined to possess sufficient base. During maneuvers, maintenance crews constantly repaired the roads in use. The surface of one 20-mile stretch near Nacogdoches, Tex., supply base for the "red army," was completely torn up. Its reconstruction will cost several hundred thousand dollars. This stretch is typical of a large mileage of Texas highway. Yet the War Department has designated 5,700 Texas-miles as military roads. The Louisiana story is practically identical.

Lieutenant-General Stanley H. Ford, commander, Sixth Corps Area, United States Army, believes, "Roads rank in importance with the soldier and his weapons as elements in the national defense." The network of roads recommended for efficient military operation approximates 80,000 miles. It generally coincides with the Federal-Aid Peacetime Highway System. Standard United States Public Roads Administration specifications for Federal-aid highways correspond to those called for by the War Department. Attack on the West Coast, for instance will demand the arrival of truck troops and fire power from eastern or southern posts to the emergency zone in 3 days. Enemy bombing attacks on planned inland plane and munition plants will exact immediate removal to safety. The wars of yesterday required days to position armed forces for major offensives. Today, minutes are priceless and decisive. America needs broad, straight, strong modern highways to link up its centers of population and industry, to connect its vast agricultural interior with the strategic districts that must be defended in the event of national emergency.

"The ability of our highway engineers to construct new modern motorways and to rebuild outworn existing roads is limited only by available funds," United States House Roads Committee Chairman WILBURN CARTWRIGHT, of Oklahoma, points out. "Recently Congress passed a new Federal Aid for Highways Act. It authorizes the annual appropriation of more than $160,000,000 for the fiscal years 1942 and 1943. These authorizations, of course, provide for only the normal expenditure for roads to serve our every-day commercial needs. No army and no navy can move without food and supplies. Roads are as necessary a part of national defense as guns and ammunition. We need roads to the farms where the food is produced. We need roads to the factories where munitions and supplies are made. We need roads so our defense forces can be transported wherever and whenever needed."

Here's an example of accepted efficient military use of highways. Fort Knox, Ky., motorized units moved 200 miles from the area of upper New York State maneuvers to the World's Fair. They arrived at specified stations within 30 seconds of scheduled time. Three thousand men and 157 pieces of equipment passed a given point in 1 hour and 20 minutes. Completely mechanized, the contingent maintained a 40-mile-per-hour speed and was complete within itself, with regimental command, supplies, hospital, kitchen, power plant, and repair section. But compare this with Hitler's highway "miracle" of 70,000 truck troops each way per hour!

Roads rule the world! Roads—good roads—can also competently defend this part of the world that refuses to be ruled. With the rest of the world at its own throat, roads are peacetime investments that will pay wartime dividends!

Sentiment in Arkansas for Material Aid to Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

LETTER FROM PRESIDENT FULBRIGHT OF STATE UNIVERSITY

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, usually the Midwest is the last to become aroused over situations abroad. However, today even in those remotest sections and in all parts of the earth where civilization has touched the heart of man, there is bitter resentment against the intolerable indecencies and indignities of those two inhuman nincompoops of Germany and Italy who are at this moment on the verge of destroying every cherished ideal which we in the Western World have held so dear. More and more the conviction is growing, and in fact we have it in his own words, that the plan of Hitler is that the fall of America shall follow the fall of Britain as certainly as the night follows day. More and more the conviction is growing among our people—whether it be for the ultimate good of the Nation or not, it is growing—that the United States should send to Britain all possible materials and aid, short of war itself. As an evidence of this trend, I insert in the RECORD a letter from President J. W. Fulbright, of the University of Arkansas, who, incidentally, is well versed in foreign affairs.

UNIVERSITY OF ARKANSAS,
Fayetteville, July 29, 1940.

Hon. CLYDE ELLIS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ELLIS: I have recently returned from a tour of the State and I am confident that the overwhelming majority of the people of this State are strongly in favor of selling or giving 50 of the reconditioned destroyers to Great Britain immediately. In fact, they favor all possible mechanical assistance and at once.

Very truly yours,

J. W. FULBRIGHT, President.

The Aliens Amendment and Immigration Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

ADDRESS BY MR. LOUW IN THE SOUTH AFRICAN ASSEMBLY, FEBRUARY 24, 1939

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Mr. Louw, of the South African Assembly:

[House of Assembly, February 24, 1939]

ALIENS AMENDMENT AND IMMIGRATION BILL

Mr. LOUW. I move that the bill be now read a second time.

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the 1937 session of this House the honorable the leader of the opposition submitted a motion in which he called upon the Government to take certain steps in regard to immigration, in regard to the matter of aliens in South Africa and, more particularly, in regard to the matter of Jewish immigration. According to the Hansard report of the debate that followed, the honorable member for Cape Town [Castle] [Mr. Alexander], in speaking to this motion, made the following statement:

"The honorable gentleman published a bill on December 28 and he is running away from his bill now. He knows perfectly well that if his motion is carried nothing can happen, excepting one thing. A motion can achieve nothing, but a bill can achieve something. It is curious that in his bill he makes no reference to the Jew at all."

Reading through that statement I felt that the honorable member had given very useful advice, and I decided to act upon that advice. Hence this bill of which the second reading is on the order paper today. Since this bill was published it has been very severely criticized in the press. It has been described as contemptible, as intolerant, as uncouth, and what not. I myself have been labeled as a racialist, as un-Christian, as a political opportunist, and as a South African prototype of Herr Streicher. Coming from certain sections of the press, I do not think that the criticisms need be taken too seriously, either as reflecting the considered opinion of these particular newspapers, or as reflecting the opinion of the majority of their readers. What we have heard has been nothing but His Master's Voice, that voice which does not hesitate to command or to threaten when Jewish interests are involved. I think the honorable member for Cape Town [Castle] can speak with some experience of His Master's Voice. We have been witnessing the same sort of thing in international affairs during the past few years, and particularly during the month of September of last year in regard to the news reports which have been coming to South Africa from America and from Europe. Those news reports I am convinced were then, and today still are, to a large extent inspired by Jewish influence.

Those reports were and are intended to stir up public feeling in regard to Germany. The efforts of Mr. Chamberlain and of M. Daladier toward appeasement have been rendered infinitely more difficult by the overt and hidden campaign which has been carried on under the influence of Jewish pressure, by the news agencies, and by the press. In September of last year a very considerable section of world Jewry was literally praying for England to be involved in a war with Germany. They were bitterly disappointed when Mr. Chamberlain and M. Daladier were able to come to an agreement with Herr Hitler at Munich, and they have not yet forgiven Mr. Chamberlain and M. Daladier. I am convinced that if it were possible to remove Jewish influence and Jewish pressure from the press and from the news agencies the international outlook would be considerably brighter than it is today. In introducing this bill I am actuated neither by fascism nor racialism. I have acted solely as a South African, as a member, sir, of one of the two sections of our population in South Africa whose forefathers were the pioneers of this country, who built up South Africa and made it what it is today. I am a member of one of those two sections that are going to remain in South Africa. There is amongst either the English or the Dutch-speaking South Africans nothing which is comparable to the Zionist movement of the Jews. In introducing this bill I have acted as a South African who is genuinely worried about the creation of a new and additional race problem in South Africa. In the second place, I, and those who feel with me, are worried about the extent to which a race, alien to and unassimilable with the English- and Dutch-speaking population in South Africa, has during past years been securing control of business and industry, and also of the professions. I know that in this matter my feelings are shared by tens of thousands of South Africans, English- as well as Afrikaans-speaking. This bill is fully backed by the Nationalist Party. And I have received support from an unexpected quarter. Sir Abe Bailey, arriving at Cape Town on one of his periodical visits to South Africa on the 26th of November of last year, was interviewed by the press, and in the course of that interview he said:

"It is not in the interests of South Africa nor of the Jews themselves that further immigration of Jews should be continued."

It is not often that the National Party finds itself on common ground with Sir Abe Bailey. In spite of that declaration made by Sir Abe Bailey, he was not labeled by the press as a racialist or as being intolerant or un-Christian. I notice, sir, that the honorable member for Johannesburg (North), Mr. Hofmeyr, at a meeting at Pretoria stated that the United Party was going to vote as one man against this bill. It is perfectly clear that the honorable member for Johannesburg (North) intended to convey the impression that every member of the United Party is opposed to the principles of my bill.

The honorable member for Johannesburg (North) knows that in his own party there is a very considerable division of opinion on this matter.

The main principle of this bill is that it admits the existence in South Africa of a Jewish problem and that it faces up to that problem. I say it is in the interests of the Jew himself in South Africa that this problem should be squarely faced. I say that if it is not faced, and if it is not tackled, we will have in South Africa a repetition of the history that has taken place in the countries of Europe.

Before proceeding further, allow me to give a short résumé of the provisions of this bill. I take it that honorable members have read the bill. It was not sprung upon them as is the case with Government measures, but was published at the beginning of January. First, as regards the definitions in the bill, I shall deal with two of these. There is the definition of the word "assimilate." I have, therefore, provided a definition which reads—

"'Assimilate,' in relation to any person, means being absorbed by, and identifying himself with, the inhabitants of the Union, with due consideration of the ethnological, racial, sociological, and cultural bases of such inhabitants."

Mr. MADELEY. In the committee stage, will you define the definition?

Mr. LOUW. I shall define it at any time.

Mr. MADELEY. Well, do it now.

Mr. LOUW. I will do it later. In the 1937 act there is a curious difference between the English text and the Afrikaans text. In the English text the word is "assimilate," and in the Afrikaans text it means "to identify himself with." The suggestion in the one case is passive, and in the other it is active. I thought it well to include both in my definition. There is another definition which has caused much discussion, namely Jewish parentage. This reads: "'Jewish parentage' in relation to any person means that person whose father and mother are or were either wholly or partly Jews, whether or not they professed to Jewish religion."

Section 2 of the bill deals with the British-born Jew. The 1937 bill dealt only with the naturalized Jew. Section 3 deals with the matter of passports, and provides in (c)—

"(c) For the purpose of either permanent residence, or temporary sojourn if his passport provides that he shall lose his nationality within a specified period, or does not permit his reentry into the country in which such passport is issued, or if his passport is one commonly known as a 'Nansen passport' or a 'travel document.'"

In this respect the bill follows the practice observed in most other countries although it is not actually mentioned in the law of England. I am informed on the best of authority that this is the practice in regard to the East African territories. I come to section 4 where a proviso is added, namely—

"That no applicant who is of Jewish parentage shall be deemed to be readily assimilable."

This is the main feature of the bill which I shall deal with later on in my speech. Subsection 2 deals with communism. Here, also, a new principle is introduced. The third subsection deals with the matter of permits. At the present time it is possible for an immigrant with a temporary permit to make application for a permit for permanent residence while he is in the country. This bill provides—and I am here following the American practice—that he has to leave the country before he can apply for a permanent permit. Moreover, he must be out of the country for a period of 6 months, otherwise, it would be easy for a person holding a temporary permit to go to Lourenco Marques, and to make application for a permanent permit from there. I have followed the practice of most European countries, and also that which is to some extent followed in England, namely, that the holders of temporary permits must report periodically to the police, so that the police can know their whereabouts. Section 6 provides that an alien who is without visible means of existence can be deported. That also is the principle observed in most countries including England. Then logically, in view of the fact that under section 4 Communists are not regarded as desirable immigrants, the next section provides that an alien can be deported who is engaged in communistic propaganda, or in any other propaganda which is likely to disturb harmonious relations between the European and the non-European sections of the population of the Union. Section 7 provides that immigrants who have entered the Union since the commencement of 1937, and who have received permits from the selection board, have to turn in these permits, and renew their application under the provisions of this act. That is to say, persons who have not yet been naturalized as citizens of the Union of South Africa. The following section deals with unnaturalized aliens who entered during the period 1930 to 1937:

Section 9 deals with the registration of aliens. That, sir, is a principle which has been adopted by practically every European country and has also been adopted by the Aliens Order of Great Britain. Section 10, when read in conjunction with the principal act, means that an alien is not allowed to change his name. Section 11 excludes members of the Diplomatic Service and Consular officials. Section 12 gives the Governor-General the power, by proclamation, to designate any business which may not be carried on by an alien or to restrict the number of businesses in which aliens may be so employed. Section 13 deals with the restriction of the employment of aliens.

Here again the bill follows the general rule observed in all European countries and which in actual practice obtains also in Great Britain. I have seen a recent instruction issued by the British Government in regard to this matter. Section 14 deals with the registration of businesses. This is the principle adopted in England during the great war, and which has been adopted by other countries. Then there follows section 15, which lays down that in case of all businesses the names of the owners should be disclosed on signboards and on letterheads. This principle has also been adopted in several countries, including to some extent Great Britain. Section 17 follows logically on the amendment of section 4. It amends the provisions of the act of 1913 and stipulates that the Yiddish language shall not be regarded as a European language. Section 18, the final section, obliges the Minister before the last day of February each year to lay upon the table of the House a full statement giving full details in regard to the working of his department and full figures in regard to the matter of immigration. At present such information has to be drawn from the Minister by way of questions, and we heard only yesterday what difficulty the opposition had in securing replies to their questions. I now proceed to discuss more particularly the principles of the bill.

I will deal first with the clause relating to communism. Section 4 provides that the Selection Board shall not admit an immigrant who is known to be, or has been a member, or a supporter of any Communist organization, or who has espoused, or professed the principles of communism. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps appropriate that this matter of communism should be dealt with in a bill which also deals with the Jewish question, because communism, since its earliest days has been linked with Jewry. This has been denied by the Jews but such denial is not in accordance with the facts. I do not suggest that all Jews are Communists. In fact the honorable member for Cape Town (Castle) (Mr. Alexander) had a Communist as his opponent at the last general election. But I do say that the Jews were the people who conceived the idea of communism, and it was by the Jews that communism was directed, and is still being directed today. That is perfectly comprehensible because communism is international, and a Jew is international in his outlook. Communism had its birth in the teachings of Karl Marx, who was a Jew. If we study the history of the Bolshevik revolution in Russia we find that the great majority of those who were the instigators of the revolution and who occupied the most prominent posts in the Bolshevik Government were Jews. I find that H. A. Gwynne in his book the Cause of the World Unrest, says that of the Bolshevist leaders 40 were Jews and 7 were Russians. I can also speak from my personal observations during the course of my diplomatic service, when I had the opportunity of seeing who were the representatives of this Soviet Government. I found that in most cases they were of the Jewish race. I remember the Soviet delegation to the League of Nations. In that delegation there were seven Jews and one Russian. We find that in most countries where communism has taken root, the leaders of communism are Jews. That is also the case in South Africa. The two leaders of communism in South Africa are Messrs. Solly Sachs and Weinberg. Communism, Mr. Speaker, is an international movement.

It is the very antithesis of nationalism in its widest sense. The declared object of communism, as stated by its leaders, is world revolution, dictatorship by the proletariat, or as they say in France, the ministry of the masses. Its doctrine is that the communistic state must arise from the destruction of the existing order. It is directed against the institutions of western civilization, against religion, the family, and private property. Then there is another very important feature of communism, which is particularly important for us in South Africa; That is, that the Communist makes no distinction whatever on political, economic, or social grounds between the black and white races. Communism is an international movement, with its headquarters in Russia, and the Communist Parties of the different countries are not merely affiliated with the communism in Moscow, but they are actually branches of the Communist Party there. We find, for instance, that the Communist paper in South Africa, the South African Worker, complete with hammer and sickle, states:

"The Communist Party of South Africa is a section of the Communist International."

The Communist Party in every country takes its instructions directly from Moscow. I had the opportunity of observing the growth and working of communism during the period of my 3 years' stay in Paris. When I arrived there there were only 10 Communist members of the Chamber of Deputies, and at the following election the number rose to between 80 and 90. With regard to the procedure which is followed by the Communists, it will be found that this is practically the same in every country in which they operate. One of the principal methods is to secure the key positions in the trade-unions. The Communist starts by causing trouble and by fomenting strikes amongst the working classes. Another favorite method of propaganda is to establish so-called liberal societies and associations. We have them in South Africa. There are the Universal Democratic League, the International Youth League, the League Against Fascism, and the Workers Defense League. There is also the Left Book Club, of which the Honorable Minister is such a great admirer, so much so that his commendation of the Left Book Club is now being used in their advertisements. There are also the Friends of the Soviet Union, and a few others.

These are the communistic societies—organizations which under the cloak of liberalism attempt to draw those with liberal tendencies into the communistic fold. Amongst the most important activities of the Communists in South Africa is propaganda amongst the natives of the country. If there is any doubt as to the intention of the Communist Party in South Africa, let honorable members turn to the case of Sachs versus the Minister of Justice (A. D. 1934); the then Minister of Justice is at present the Minister of Defense. They will find that the Minister of Justice in that case filed affidavits based upon confidential information received from police and other sources, in which it was clearly established that it was the intention of the Communist Party to establish in South Africa a black republic. But it is not necessary for the Minister to go to the case of Sachs versus the Minister of Justice. If they will only take a walk down to the parade and listen to the speeches which are delivered there to natives and colored by Communist agitators, then they will realize that there is serious communistic propaganda in our country. The Right Honorable the Minister of Justice—and I think also the Minister of the Interior—have in the past made light of these meetings on the parade and tried to dismiss them as being merely soap-box oratory, comparable with the oratory in Hyde Park, London. I have had the advantage of attending both, and I can assure members of this House that there is a very distinct difference between the two. The attitude of the Hyde Park audience is one of amused tolerance. They are out for an afternoon's pleasure and have fun in heckling the speakers. But go down to the parade and watch one of these men addressing a colored and native gathering, and you will see an entirely different attitude on the part of the audience. They are in dead earnest as they listen to the propaganda which is being poured into their ears. I say that there is serious danger from communistic propaganda in South Africa in view of the fact that we have a black population of about 6,000,000, and it is very necessary in the interests of peace that communistic propaganda should be curbed. Another method followed by the Communists is to establish what is called the popular front. In France they have the Front Populaire, in Spain there was the thing, and here in South Africa, too, an attempt is being made to establish a popular front. I have before me the minutes of the meeting which was held in camera in Johannesburg and attended by representatives of 26 trade-unions. I find running through the discussions the same refrain, namely, "Organize the black worker." We find, for instance, Comrade Basner stating that he was very much interested in the united front, which has been successful in several countries. "I tell you," he said, "we will not win strikes in South Africa without the assistance of the natives." Miss Cornelius, the young lady who has been taking trips to Moscow to attend communistic gatherings there, said, "We must help to organize the natives, even if not in one organization. The united front is wide enough to embrace all. We must get the natives, but as we must not antagonize the whites we must be careful not to bring the natives into the forefront." I could go on quoting from several of these speeches, all in the same line—"organize the native"—and eventually, as far as the Communist Party is concerned, the establishment of a black proletariat here in South Africa.

Now, I come to what is the main feature of the bill, namely, the new principle introduced of definitely naming the Jewish race as a race not suitable for immigration into South Africa. This is the feature of the bill that has been most discussed, most criticised, and I am glad to say, most commended. In this section 4 (b) which I have already quoted, we have an extension of the principle of previous legislation, the act of 1937, and also the 1930 quota act, where the Jew was aimed at, but not specifically named. In this act he is specifically named. Now, the objection which is made is that in this act I discriminate against the Jew as such. I frankly admit that there is discrimination against the Jew as an immigrant, and against the Jew who is still an alien in South Africa. And while on this question of discrimination, let me point out this to those newspapers, and to those who have been the most violent critics of my bill, that they themselves practice a form of discrimination against the Jew—not the man who is coming in, not the Jew who is an alien, but the old-established Jew. These very people are practicing a form of discrimination which, in my opinion, hurts the Jew in his self-respect and pride far more than anything in the bill. I refer to social discrimination. That is being practiced every day. The same man who writes the editorial criticizing my bill; the same man who gets on a platform and makes a speech in defense of the Jew. Those same men will not propose a Jew as a member of their exclusive clubs. It has happened right here near Cape Town. I am informed that not so long ago two very well known Jews, against whom nothing whatever could be said, men of culture, men of standing in the community, were proposed as members of a certain Cape Town club, and in both cases they were blackballed because they were Jews, and for no other reason. We find the same thing in everyday conversation. These same people who call me intolerant, and accuse me of discrimination, speak contemptuously of the Jews as "Yids" when they are in private conversation among themselves, or having a drink together. I have been accused of anti-Semitism, and what not, but let me say in all sincerity, that I have never yet in private conversation spoken of a Jew as a "Yid." These people who pose as friends of the Jews are the same people who are practicing social discrimination against the Jews in South Africa.

And it is not only in South Africa, it is the same in America. In New York and in Chicago the Jews were obliged to establish their own clubs, because they were not admitted to the clubs of the "gentile" Americans. I am informed that in Cape Town they have established their own clubs for the same reason. There is a man who has written a book on the Jews, and who is a friend of the Jews. This is what he says: "The Jews who mix with the wealthiest classes in London have no idea of their true position in the eyes of their hosts."

He goes on to say: "We play a deliberately false part in our relations with Jews."

I say that such an attitude on the part of those who are today accusing me of anti-Semitism, of racialism and intolerance, is nothing but rank hypocrisy. Furthermore, it is not fair to the Jews themselves. It places the Jew in a false position; it gives him a false sense of security, and afterward when he wakes up and finds that there is a certain amount of anti-Jewish feeling in the country, then he is surprised because to his face he has been told one thing, and behind his back another attitude is adopted. Such hypocrisy complicates an already serious problem. My bill certainly does not suffer from hypocrisy. It is characterized by complete candor and frankness.

But unfortunately candor and frankness are very often mistaken for hostility.

Why is this principle of discrimination introduced into my bill? Because in the first place the Jew is not assimilable. I am going to deal with that aspect of the bill later. That the Jew is not assimilable has been shown from the records of history, and it is also admitted by the Jew himself. Secondly, this bill discriminates against the Jewish immigrant and Jewish alien, because owing to certain racial characteristics he creates a problem in any country as soon as the Jewish population exceeds a certain percentage of the total. Thirdly, because in South Africa the Jewish population has already reached that percentage, and consequently we have with us today a Jewish problem which must be squarely faced. I will deal first with assimilation, because that is the basic principle of my bill. That is no new principle. It has been already adopted by the South African Parliament.

It was adopted in the Quota Act, and confirmed in the act of 1937, so we have accepted that principle of assimilability. But in the act of 1937 it was left to the Selection Board to decide whether or not a particular race or person is assimilable. Parliament gave to the board a very wide discretion which necessarily must be influenced by the personal opinions of its members, and it may happen that there may be a difference of opinion as to whether a certain race is or is not assimilable. It may also happen that the personnel of the board may change, and there may be a change in policy.

In other words, we cannot be sure of having in South Africa uniformity of policy in regard to this very serious question. When, therefore, it is known from the record of history, and from the frank admission of its members, that a certain race is not readily assimilable; and when we know from our own observation that such a race has not been absorbed by either the English-speaking or by the Dutch-speaking section of the population, then the time has arrived that the board must receive instructions by legislation that such a race is not assimilable. That is the object of section 4 (b). My contention is that the Jewish race, taken as a whole, is not readily absorbed by either the Dutch- or English-speaking sections in South Africa. I know there are exceptions, there are exceptions to every rule, and so also there have been exceptions in the case of the Jewish race. But let us look at history. Since the great dispersion, for a period of over 2,000 years, the Jew has wandered over the face of the earth, and today he is found in all countries of the globe; but throughout the ages, scattered as he is today over the face of the earth, he has always remained a Jew. You don't speak of a Jew in England as an Englishman, or in Holland as a Dutchman, or in France as a Frenchman. No; you speak of him as an English Jew, a Dutch Jew, or a French Jew. He has maintained his racial identity and his Jewish customs, he has remained true to the faith of his forefathers, he has maintained the purity of his Jewish blood, and above all he has remained a separate nation. Now, sir; in spite of my being accused of being an anti-Semite, let me say in all sincerity that I think that it is very wonderful that the Jews over a period of 2,000 years, often living under unfavorable conditions, have retained the integrity of their race. But that very fact proves that they are, and will remain a separate nation; in other words, that they are, and will remain unassimilable. The reason is apparent. Read through the Old Testament, the Laws of Moses. I could quote dozens of texts to show that the Jew received strict injunctions that he should not mix with the nations amongst whom he lived. Look at the teachings of the Talmud. I have gone to the fountain head as far as it has been possible for me to do so. I have here a book, Miscellaneous Extracts From the Talmud—the more important extracts—and it is edited by a Jew. It is the teaching of the Talmud—which the Jew is taught in his schools—that he must keep his race pure, and remain a separate nation. I find in the Jewish Chronicle of 1935, that a Talmudical Society was established in South Africa, and on that occasion Rabbi Mervish stated that "the study of the Torah distinguished Jews from other nations, and kept them together as a people."

But for centuries at a time the Jews have also lived in circumstances favorable to absorption. There were times when they were persecuted in certain countries and also in Great Britain, but there have also been long periods when they have lived under favorable circumstances in Great Britain and elsewhere, and yet they were not absorbed. Even in America, the so-called melting pot of the world, they have remained a separate nation.

The Jew has a remarkable aptitude of being able to adapt himself to his environment, of being able to adopt the customs and the ways of living of the people amongst whom he lives, of being able to acquire the veneer of the people amongst whom he lives. That is where people make a mistake.

They think that is absorption. It is nothing of the kind. It is merely the facility of the Jew to adapt himself to his environment. What is Zionism but the refusal of the Jew to assimilate, and that was the idea of Theodore Herzl, the founder of the movement. Mr. Speaker, the Jew is a nomad by nature. I am not saying that in an unfavorable sense. I am not comparing the Jew with the gypsy; but the history of the Jew is a history of his wandering among the nations of the earth. The Jew is a cosmopolitan. The Jew looks forward to that time when there will be reestablished a Jewish state where he will await the coming of the Messiah. But let the Jew speak for himself. I don't want to weary the House with quotations, but I think it is necessary to hear what leading Jews say. These books from which I shall quote are to be found in the parliamentary library. Ludwig Lewissohn, a well-known Jewish writer, says: "Assimilation is impossible, because the Jew cannot change his national character."

He goes on further and says: "Assimilation is bankrupt. Germany was the great laboratory experiment, and I think that the experiment was necessary, but it failed."

Then there is another book, The Real Jew, written by H. Newman, with an introduction by Israel Zangwill. What does he say?

"In examining the causes which have served to keep the Jews a people apart we find that deeply engraved in the soul of the Jewish people there are certain fundamental ideals. * * * These created an impassable barrier between their own deeply rooted ideas of life and those of the surrounding peoples. Thus, whereas the Flemings, the Normans, and the Huguenots were able wholly to assimilate with the English race at various epochs in their history, the Jews have never been able to merge themselves in their new environment to the same extent.

Then, sir, I find in A Book of Jewish Thoughts by Dr. J. H. Hertz, I think he was chief rabbi at one time, a chapter headed "The tragedy of assimilation." He says: "What I understand by assimilation is loss of identity. It is the kind of assimilation that I dread most, even more than pogroms."

Then from Jewish Life in Modern Times, by Israel Cohen: "However acute the divisions may be on the merits of orthodoxy, or on the virtue of the Zionist ideal, they are leveled by the influence of the past, which generates a spirit of solidarity welding the disparate units into a harmonious whole. Opposed to the agencies consciously striving for the conservation of Jewry are forces working for its dissolution. * * * There is open advocacy of assimilation, viz, that Jews should regard as distinguished from their fellow citizens merely in respect of religion, but that otherwise they should merge themselves completely in the general life of a nation in whose midst they dwell. * * * Thus the soul of Israel amongst the nations is nowhere immune from insidious assault."

Then I find that a distinguished Jew, Mr. Basil M. Henriques, made a speech in London which was reported in the Zionist Record of South Africa of the 29th of January last, and he says: "There must be no assimilation. We are a peculiar people, and a peculiar people we must remain."

I find also in the Zionist Record an article by Mr. Ludwig Lewissohn. He says: "Men exist in groups that create their cultures in their own image, and as the expression of their permanent character. Men exist in no other way. Neither do Jews. We are a culture group; we are a people; we are a nationality. No; don't stick your head into the sand at this point. It's so silly, and so unrealistic, and so cowardly. We are a nationality."

And so, Mr. Speaker, when one examines the writings of Jewish writers, of those who have spoken on behalf of their race, one finds them fighting against this idea of assimilation. I repeat: The history of the Jews in those countries in which they have lived under favorable circumstances show that they may absorb others, but they themselves cannot be absorbed. It is also clear from their own admissions and statements that they do not wish to be absorbed.

In the second place, it is necessary to discriminate against the Jewish immigrants and the alien Jew in South Africa because, owing to certain racial characteristics and habits, the Jew creates a problem as soon as his numbers unduly increase. What happens is that you have an alien body in the general body of the state, and, as in the human organism, such an alien body causes irritation and friction and results in inflammation and disease. That is what has happened in many other countries, and that is what is happening in South Africa today. What are those racial characteristics?

In the first place, the Jew is international. He is international in his outlook; and, furthermore, he is part of a vast interlocked organization. His race is spread over the globe, a race that is bound by ties of culture, religion, and blood, to which add the bonds of finance and commerce and industry.

The Jew, in the first instance, is loyal to his own people, loyal to Israel, and what Israel stands for. In the second place he is concerned mainly with his own personal and material interests. May I refer to the position during the Great War in England? It explains this characteristic of the Jew. If one reads the post-war books, it is perfectly clear that there was something wrong, especially during the earlier years of the war. Honorable members may remember that meetings were held in England to protest against what was called the hidden hand. That hidden hand was the intrigue and disloyalty of the Jewish banking and financial firms. Jewry believed that the central powers were going to win the war, and therefore the majority of Jews were backing the central powers. It was perfectly clear that things were going wrong in England, for instance, with regard to supplies of foodstuffs, and that the blockade of Germany was ineffectual. It was later discovered that there was disloyalty on the part of some of the Jews in London and elsewhere. It will be recollected the Sir Edgar Speyer, a privy councilor, was later deprived of his naturalization certificate and of his honors, because it was proved that he was a member of the coterie of Jewish financiers who were working against the interests of England. Then the position became so acute that the British Government was obliged to do something in order to secure the support of the Jews. It was during the most critical period of the war. What did they do? It came in the form of the Balfour declaration on Palestine. That declaration was not merely a happy idea on the part of Mr.

Balfour. It was necessary for England to enlist Jewish help. The Jews were against England, but the Jew was prepared to give his help to the Allied cause for a price, and the price that the British Government paid was the Balfour declaration. I noticed in the discussion, which took place in 1937, that the honorable member for Troyeville, Mr. Kentridge, denied that there was such a thing as Jewish solidarity or organized Jewry. Allow me again to quote what the Jews themselves say about that matter of their solidarity. I have here Jewish Life, by Israel Cohen, and what he says throws some light on what is happening in South Africa. He states: "Amidst the welter of conflicting movements there is one unifying element, the sentiment of solidarity. The concrete form in which it is normally manifested, is the spontaneous organization of the communities in whatever part of the world the Jews settle. The simplest and commonest form of Jewish solidarity is the organized community which will be found in any town containing even a handful of Jews. * * * The town communities are linked together by associations with a central body in the metropolis either for religious or secular purposes. The religious body acts as the ecclesiastical authority; the secular as the guardian of civil and political interests. Cognate in origin, allied by the same traditions, these communities give to modern Jewry the semblance of a vast network of autonomous settlements."

He goes on to describe the whole machinery of organized Jewry and the solidarity of Jewry, and he explains how in political matters organized Jewry acts as one. Here in South Africa there is also this organized Jewry the existence of which has been denied by the Jews and their supporters. I found a very interesting book in the library, The South African Jewish Year Book. It was presented to the parliamentary library by Mr. Morris Alexander. The editor of the yearbook gives a historical review of Jewish organizations in South Africa and, more particularly, of the work of the Jewish Board of Deputies. He states that a board of deputies was first established in the Transvaal and Natal. The objects of the board were "to watch and take action with reference to all matters affecting the welfare of the Transvaal and Natal Jews as a community." It was further decided that "the board shall take observations of all proceedings relative to legislative municipal enactments, and shall use such means as they may deem requisite, in order that no infraction of the Jews' rights, and of the privileges of the Jewish community may ensue therefrom." We find that is a review of the work of the board of deputies; on March 6, 1907, it was reported inter alia that Mr. Jack Cohen had seen the editor of the Sunday Times regarding the use of the word "Peruvian." The board also put a stop to the practice of using the word "Jew" in charge sheets and in newspapers in their reports of criminal cases. In 1910 the number of immigrant cases began to grow and the board resolved to give the question of immigration the board's special attention. During the discussion on the 1937 bill, it was denied in this House that the Jewish Board of Deputies had taken an active part in the question of promoting Jewish immigration to South Africa. Let us hear what the report says about the work of the board in regard to the matter of immigration. In 1904 it says: "Lord Milner agreed that all Jews who had no permits to stay in South Africa could apply for them. The Jewish Board of Deputies appointed a special committee to deal with the matter. So strenuously did the board work that it is reported that 300 applicants had been recommended for permits."

This work being so successful, it was decided to extend their activities. We find a Jewish Board of Deputies in the Cape Colony in 1905. It took steps to have Jewish shopkeepers exempted from the operation of the Half Holiday Act, such facilities being granted to butchers who had had their shops closed on the Jewish Sabbath. One of the features of the Jewish problem is that the Jews, as a community, are always claiming for themselves special privileges. Here we have the same thing. They claim the privilege of not closing their shops on the usual half-holiday. It is reported that the board dealt with a number of immigration cases, with the result "that many deserving immigrants were allowed to land who otherwise would have been sent back to the countries whence they came." The immigration authorities had decided to send some of them back, but so effectively did the Jewish Board of Deputies work that these people were allowed to land. In view of the successful work of the board of deputies it was decided to hold a conference at Bloemfontein. The writer refers to South African Jewry "denoting as it does today a cohesive whole composed of the organized Jewish population of this subcontinent, its component and well-defined parts organized, correlated to each other even more efficiently than in the case of Jewries in some of the older countries."

So the good work goes on. A meeting of the board was held in 1913. It was reported that the first 2 years of the South African board's history were chiefly concerned with matters of immigration and with consolidating the board's position. They urged the appointment of a Jew on the appeal board. Then another congress was held. This congress was chiefly notable for the protest against legislation against aliens in the bill then before Parliament. Resolutions were adopted protesting against the introduction of the registration proposal, the same registration system which I have in my bill. They protested on the ground that it was a violation of the rights of a large number of Jews in South Africa. Again, the claim of special privileges for the Jew. As a result of these representations the objectionable sections were ultimately deleted from the bill. But we are told that there is no such thing as Jewish pressure on behalf of the organized Jewish community. The report goes on to say that the executive, as the result of the war and its aftereffects, was obliged to go beyond the strict letter of the board's objects as laid down in its constitution, and the board was empowered to deal with the welfare of Jews overseas, in addition to concerning itself with the well-being of those in southern Africa. "Thus," the report proceeds, "the board greatly widened the scope of its activities and developed an international phase of activity." It goes on to say that in 1920–21 Jewish immigration began to increase, and the board published information both here and overseas. They sent information overseas in order to encourage Jewish immigrants to come to South Africa, and including information regarding the procedure to be adopted regarding emigration to South Africa. Then, in 1921, the congress met again, and a protest was made against the raising of the naturalization fee. Deputations were sent to the government and it was decided to organize protest meetings of Jews all over the country in the event of General Smuts' reply being unsatisfactory. A deputation was received by the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior and, as a result, the fee was reduced to £5.

I will now deal with the matter of pressure which is being exerted by organized Jewry in South Africa. Strong pressure was brought to bear in connection with the report of the Carnegie Commission in South Africa, because the commission in its report mentioned the fact of Jewish competition and the difficulty of South Africans being able to find work. It is well known that the Jews have at different times tried to secure favorable reports in the press and brought pressure to bear on the editors of newspapers in South Africa. In regard to the treatment of Jews in Germany, public meetings were held in different parts of the country. These public meetings were advertised as being nonsectarian and nonracial, but it is known that in those cases the procedure was that certain gentlemen well known as Christian leaders were asked to organize the meetings in order to give the impression of these meetings being genuine gentile protests. Then we have the matter of the boycott against German goods. This matter was raised during the last session of this House. The honorable member for Cape Town (Castle) denied that the Jewish community had anything to do with the Jewish boycott in this country and said that the Jews themselves merely decided not to buy German goods. He received support from the honorable member for Benoni (Mr. Madeley), who said that his party had been responsible for the boycott. If the honorable member for Benoni, or if the South African Trades and Labor Council wish to suggest that this German boycott originated with them, then in the language of the classics I say: "Go and tell that to the marines." The idea originated with the Jews, and they used the South African Trades and Labor Council for the purpose of initiating this boycott. I have before me a circular which was sent to a gentile firm calling upon them to boycott German goods and also warning them not to advertise in a German paper published in Johannesburg. The circular ends by saying: "Do you know that the Jewish community will see to it that your firm is boycotted if you continue to advertise in the Deutsch-Afrikaner of Pretoria?"

I have also the envelope addressed to the firm in question. That was the way the boycott was carried on. It is still being carried on today. I have here a notice which is put on orders which are sent overseas by Jewish firms in the following form: "Acceptance of goods will be refused if the goods are shipped by a German vessel or through a German port or insured with a German company."

Now, sir, when the Jew buys goods for his own personal use he is perfectly entitled to do that if he wishes, but in this case he is not buying goods for his own consumption, but goods which are sold to the gentile population. I have the Boycott Bulletin which I read last year. The honorable member for Cape Town (Castle) said it was published in England. It was published in England, but it was distributed in South Africa. The boycott is a favorite weapon which is used by Jewry, and it is an efficient weapon from their point of view, because of the control they exercise on trade and industry.

Allow me to say—and I say it with a full sense of responsibility—to the Jewish population of South Africa that in making use of this boycott weapon in connection with trade or in connection with press advertisements they are playing with fire, they are using a double-edged weapon. I say that the time will come when the people of South Africa will turn and will not tolerate that sort of weapon being used in our country. I think that it is well that that word of warning should be sounded to the Jewish community in South Africa. Reverting to the matter of immigration, I have already referred to the reports of the meetings of the Jewish Board of Deputies. In the 1937 debate there was read a telegram or a letter which was sent to Bentwich, in which it was stated that the Jewish Board of Deputies had advised against any further Jewish immigration into South Africa. Of course, such a letter was sent; it was sent as a matter of tactics, because the immigrants were arriving here in boatloads. The Stuttgart had arrived, there were 360 on the Carnarvon Castle, and naturally the board in effect warned: "Don't send them in such big crowds; it is making trouble; let them dribble in." I happen to know something about Jewish emigration from my personal knowledge. There is in Paris a certain organization—I think it is called Ica—a Jewish colonization organization, with offices at 26 Rue Bassano in Paris. That organization instructed one of the banks in South Africa to pay out a sum of £5,000 to be used as deposits for immigrants arriving here from Europe. And yet we are told that the Jewish community in South Africa did not encourage immigration into our country. I will now leave the question of immigration. We know it has been encouraged by the Jews in South Africa, and the sooner they realize that there is already a sufficiently large Jewish population in this country the better it will be for the older-established Jewish population itself.

Another factor which causes friction is Jewish control of finance and business, the formation of monopolies, and also the domination of the professions. This is particularly so with regard to high finance and international banking. It is unnecessary to enter into that. I am sure that the members of the Jewish race themselves will admit that they control high finance and international banking in Europe and in America. Remember that the international banker controls credit, and through his control of credit, he is also able to exercise control over industry and trade. International finance and industry and trade are thus closely related. In the United States the Jews have already managed to secure control of a number of the most important industries in the country, finance, the wholesale and retail trade, the garment trade, motion pictures, furniture and liquor trade, and so on. To a large extent the same thing has happened in England. But let us come to South Africa. One has only to go about the country to see to what extent the Jew is controlling retail and wholesale business in South Africa. He controls the liquor trade. There is a firm known as the South African Board of Distilleries, which is almost entirely controlled by Jews. To a large extent the Jew controls the meat trade, and he almost entirely controls the theater and cinema business. He exercises a large measure of control over the hotel trade and shirt manufacture—the honorable member for Maitland (Mr. Mushet) will be able to confirm to what extent today Jewish interests control the manufacture of shirts in South Africa. In the retail tobacco trade it is the same thing, and then one has only to look to the enormous economic control exercised by a prominent Jew, Mr. I. W. Schlesinger, to realize to what lengths this has gone. Not content with the control of finance and business, the Jew is now turning to the professions. I have gone through the telephone list very carefully in Johannesburg and Cape Town, and have taken only those names which I am quite sure are Jewish. What do I find?

That in Johannesburg 65 percent of the attorney firms are Jewish; of the advocates, 45 percent are Jewish; in Cape Town the attorneys are 41 percent and the advocates 28 percent. I have here the list of the law certificate examination results of January of this year. Forty-four percent of the successful candidates in the law-certificate examination were Jews.

Mr. KENTRIDGE. Did you look through the Taalbond results?

Mr. LOUW. I don't deny that the Jew is an expert linguist, and that he will also excel in the Taalbond examination, so that he can thereby compete more successfully in business and trade and in the professions. Nobody has ever denied the genius of the Jew, and he will succeed in the Taalbond examination because he fully appreciates its value, in view of the fact that South Africa is a bilingual country. As regards medical practitioners, in Johannesburg 48 percent are Jews, and that, I am informed, is a very conservative estimate, because I have not included the names of persons who have changed their names. In Cape Town at least 31 percent of the medical practitioners are Jews. In the Witwatersrand University final examination 68 percent of the successful medical students were Jews. In Cape Town the percentage was 32 percent. I am informed that in the first-, second-, and third-year classes the percentage is even higher. But, sir, it is not only in business and the professions where the Jew occupies a position out of all proportion to his percentage of the population. We find him also in positions of authority. That is particularly so in England and America.

That was particularly the case in England during the period of the Great War. In the Lloyd George cabinet there were several Jews. The Spectator, in an editorial in 1920, wrote—

"We are convinced that at the present moment persons of the Jewish faith are far too numerous in our Cabinet. We have got a great many more Jews than we deserve."

The Spectator probably also had in mind the Marconi scandal which had taken place not long before in which several prominent Jews were implicated. Following the same line as that taken by the honorable member for Troyeville when he referred to the question of the Taalbond examination, the Jews often ask, "Why is the gentile unable to compete with the Jew? Is it not the fault of the gentile himself?" That charge has often been leveled.

Let me frankly admit that the Jew is a very clever and adroit businessman, but there are other reasons why the gentile finds it difficult to compete with him. Firstly, as regards international trade and finance, there is the fact that the Jew is international, and has international affiliations. As regards inland trade, there is that racial cement, that bond of racial unity which enables the Jew to make arrangements which it is impossible for the gentile to make under similar circumstances. And finally, let me add this, namely, that in his business dealings with the gentile the Jew undoubtedly has a different outlook and a different business standard. I don't want to go too deeply into that aspect, as I do not wish to hurt the susceptibilities of members of this House who are Jews, but I would mention that the matter is dealt with in the Talmud, which is the collection of laws and precepts by which the everyday life of the Jew is guided. In the Talmud there are certain precepts which throw a very interesting light upon the attitude and on the standards of the Jew when he is dealing with the gentiles. I have here a collection of Talmudic precepts, and the editor of this book says in the introduction—

"Here is the law for the man of thought and the man of action; the law of the household and the law of the state; directions for the health of the body; the attainment of wise knowledge, the conquest of virtue, and the conduct of life. . . . It covers the whole field of life, and its principles affect or ought to affect, every thought and every action of every member in the Jewish state. Such, in the abstract, is the regard in which this book is held in Jewry."

No Jew, I think, would deny that in his daily life he is guided by the precepts which he finds in the Talmud. I suggest to anybody who wishes to go into the matter further to study the Talmud, and he will find some light thrown on the question as to why the Jew is able to compete so successfully with the gentile.

Another habit of the Jew which creates trouble and friction, especially when his numbers exceed a certain percentage, is the Jewish habit of secrecy. That aptitude of the Jew of being able to conceal what he wishes to keep secret, especially when it is in his own interests, was probably initiated during the period of the persecutions, but it has remained a habit of the Jew and has become almost a national instinct. This habit of secret action will be illustrated by reference to a case which was heard in the Supreme Court at Cape Town about a year ago, when a certain Mr. Goodman, representing the Jewish Board of Deputies, secured an interdict against Mr. von Moltke, calling upon him to refrain from publishing certain documents which he had in his possession.

Mr. BLACKWELL. Stolen papers.

Mr. LOUW. If they were or were not stolen, I don't know. The question is, Why was there that undue haste on the part of the Jewish board of deputies to prevent the publication of those documents? I think the inference to be drawn from their action is that there were in those documents certain matters which the Jewish Board of Deputies did not want published in South Africa.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. What did the court do?

Mr. LOUW. The court granted the injunction on the ground of authorship, that the persons who had written the letters had not given Von Moltke the right of authorship. This habit of concealment takes another form in the changing of names. Why does the Jew change his name? It is in order to give an outward appearance of having been assimilated. The honorable member for Troyeville (Mr. Kentridge) admitted during the 1937 debate why he changed his name. Some remark was made about his having changed his name, and he said that he did it to show that he had been assimilated. But the honorable member remains the same Jew that he was, whether he is called Kentridge or Kantorovitch. Another reason why the Jew changes his name is to secure certain advantages of a business or a social nature, and that is happening in South Africa. I put a question to the honorable the Minister the other day. I took at random two cases which I happened to find in the Government Gazette, where two Jews had changed their names. I asked what were "the good and sufficient reasons" postulated by the act for the change of the name, and the Minister replied that these particular persons had changed their names "for business, social, and personal reasons." I submit that it was not the intention of the act that a man should be permitted to change his name for such reasons. When a man changes his name for business reasons he is practicing deception upon his customers and upon the people in the town where he does business, and I say to the Minister that he was not acting according to the spirit and according to the letter of the act of 1937 when he allowed people to change their names for business, social, and personal reasons. That is not a good and sufficient reason under that act.

Mr. Speaker, I have shown that the Jew is unassimilable, and that he has certain racial characteristics which cause friction. I have shown that when the Jewish population figure reaches a certain percentage of the population of a state, it causes trouble. That is also the view of the Jews themselves. The great leader of Jewish Zionism, Dr. Herzl, is quoted in the South African Jewish Chronical of the 25th of May, 1934: "Herzl foresaw long ago that the percentage of Jews that a county can absorb before anti-Semitism sets in is very low, barely 5 percent. After that a saturation sets in, the weather breaks, and threatening storms appear on the horizon."

Here in South Africa the Jewish population exceeds that percentage of safety. The saturation point was reached some time ago, and the storm clouds are not merely on the horizon, they have already moved up. I am not going to enter into discussion on figures, I am not going to ask whether in this year more Jews were allowed in than in another year, because that is beside the point, in view of the terms of my bill, which provides that no further Jewish immigration should be allowed in South Africa. But what I do say is that, having regard to the state of the problem, and the serious proportions it has attained in South Africa, we have to ask three questions:

What is the Jewish population in South Africa; what percentage of the total white population does that constitute; and, finally, is it being fed by further immigration? It is difficult to arrive at a definite figure as to what the South African Jewish population is today. In the first place the census figures are based on religious confession and in 1939 the Jews themselves admitted that there were then about 400 Jews in South Africa who no longer attended the synagogue. The immigration figures are definitely not reliable, because in the first place those figures are dependent upon the Jew's own statement as to whether he is or is not of the Jewish race, and knowing that there is a certain amount of anti-Jewish feeling, he hesitates to state whether or not he is of the Jewish race. Then there is the fact that thousands of temporary visitors come to South Africa. In what way are they being controlled? We are told about the deposit, but a Jew is cheerfully going to forfeit this deposit, if by so doing he can be certain of remaining in the country. There are also the in-transit immigrants, figures running into several hundreds per month. What check has the minister that they do not remain in the country, or that having gone into a neighboring country, that they do not return? Here again the minister's reply about the deposit does not hold water, because the Jew or any other immigrant will cheerfully forfeit that deposit if there is any prospect of his being able to remain in South Africa. As to visitors going into neighboring territories and again recrossing the boundaries, the Minister's reply shows that there is nothing to prevent these people from reentering the Union. In November 1936 the Jewish Board estimated that the Jewish population was 95,000.

Add to those figures the immigration figures of the selection board, allow a percentage for those who do not attend the synagogue, and for visitors and in-transit immigrants; allow also for the natural increase, because the Jews live according to the Mosaic laws, which tell them to be fruitful and to multiply. I think it will be found that there is a much higher birth rate among the Jews than among the rest of the population. On this basis I think it can be safely said that on a conservative estimate the Jewish population must be today between 98,000 and 100,000, and that brings us to 5 percent of the white population of South Africa. I do not know whether honorable members realize there are only three other contries in Europe that have a higher percentage of Jewish population than South Africa. We are fourth on the list, and we are practically equal with the third, which is Hungary; the others being Poland and Lithuania.

Mr. BLACKWELL. The United States surely has 5 percent.

Mr. LOUW. Nothing like it. Then, sir, quite apart from the matter of percentage, South Africa has in actual numbers a larger Jewish population than 15 European countries. That is the present position. What about the future? Is the Jewish population being increased by immigration, apart from the natural increase? In answer to that question, I would point to the fact that since the act of 1937 was passed Jewish immigration has exceeded on the average 1,000 per annum. During the period 1928 to 1938, on a conservative estimate, allowing for British-born Jews, but not allowing for visitors who have remained, and in-transit immigrants, 16,880 Jewish immigrants entered South Africa, and during the period 1934 to 1938 there were 7,584. Is there any reason to expect a decrease of Jewish immigration in South Africa? I say definitely no, because a new situation has developed in Europe and every effort is being made to find homes for thousands of Jewish refugees. One has only to read the press to see to what extent that is being done. Propaganda is being carried on not only in Europe but here in South Africa. The Minister was visited by members of Rand constituencies who asked him to open the door wider to Jewish immigration. According to two newspaper reports, the Minister said he was prepared to give favorable consideration to their representations. He did not pledge himself to anything, and I do not suggest that he has acceded to the request made by those honorable members. But it shows that pressure is being brought to bear to secure the admission of Jewish refugees into this country. Poland and Rumania have indicated that they want to get rid of their Jewish population, and England also is doing its utmost to get rid of its refugees.

Propaganda is being made, and pressure is being exerted to induce the Government to open the door wider. We have the visit of Lord Marley. He has come here ostensibly to get funds for the Jewish refugees, but reading the speeches of Lord Marley, and reading between the lines, you will find that he is also creating a certain atmosphere, appealing to people's humanitarian feelings, and saying, in effect: "Here are these poor, homeless people; why don't you help them?" That sort of thing is going on and if ever there was a time when a bill of this kind was necessary, it is now when efforts are being made all over the world to find room for Jewish refugees. Our attitude, sir, the attitude of the Nationalist Party, is that the Jewish population of South Africa is already too large. It has exceeded the danger point percentage. It is no good telling me that during this or that year immigration was so much less, or was only so much. Even if the number of immigrants were 100 per annum, I say that they are 100 too many, in view of the fact that saturation point has been reached, in the words of Dr. Herzl, the leader of the Zionist movement. We say that Jewish immigration must be completely stopped. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that that is the view, not only of those of us who sit on this side of the House, but I am convinced that that is the view which is shared by the great majority of the English- and Dutch-speaking people in South Africa. I say that the time has arrived when we have to deal frankly with this problem. We owe it to our children, and it is only fair to the Jewish population themselves, to let them know where they stand, to deal openly and frankly and honestly with them. This bill of mine, contrary to the criticisms which have been made in the press, does not touch the old-established Jew in South Africa. It is aimed to prevent any further Jewish immigration. It is further aimed at the alien Jew at present in South Africa. May I commend, sir, to this House and also to honorable Members who are Jews, and to Jews outside of this House, the words of a man who is a friend of the Jews, the words of Hillaire Belloc. He says:

"There is a Jewish problem, and the Jews who resent the statement of the problem, and an attempt at solving it, are not doing their own people any good, and they are at the same time denying us the right to put our house in order, which denial is of course intolerable."

I commend to the Jews and to their liberal friends to ponder very carefully over those words of Mr. Belloc. To honorable members on the other side of the House and to the Government, I say we have here today in South Africa a very serious problem, a complicated problem, and a problem which is growing more serious with every immigrant who is coming into the country. I say, sir, to the Government and to honorable members on that side of the house that if their Jewish supporters decline to see reason, then you owe it to the country to eliminate this factor from political considerations. You owe it to the pioneers of the Great Trek, whose centenary we recently celebrated, and you owe it to the pioneers of the 1820 settlers, those English- and Dutch-speaking pioneers who left a heritage for their descendants in our country.

I say further, you owe it to the people of South Africa, and you owe it to future generations of South Africans to tackle this problem now, before it is too late. I say to the Jewish members of this House and to the Jewish community outside the House, "In your own interests, beware that you do not put anything in the way of the tackling of this problem. I say to you, read the history of your own race, and be satisfied with the numbers that you have in the country today."

VIEWS OF THE REPUBLICAN MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE IN THE SEVENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following views of the Republican Members of the House in the Seventy-sixth Congress:

OUR POLICY OF DEFENSE AND THE MISSION OF OUR MILITARY FORCES THEREUNDER

(Submitted to the House February 14, 1939)

In the foreign policy of the United States, which has been consistent and has developed naturally with the years, there has been for over a century but one principle which has remained definite and unchanged—the principle known as the Monroe Doctrine. The famous declaration of President Monroe informed the nations of Europe that the United States would regard any attempt to extend European domination in the countries of Central and South America as an unfriendly act. It is not a treaty, nor has any foreign power ever approved it. It is, in truth, a "no trespass" sign posted around the entire area south of the Rio Grande, and as the years have passed we have made it plain that the warning is addressed to all foreign powers, no matter where situated.

While the doctrine may be of advantage to the nations of Latin America, fundamentally it is our doctrine and ours alone. We adhere to it because we are convinced that our safety is dependent upon its enforcement. It is a policy of defense.

The United States may from time to time adopt new attitudes and pursue new policies relating to other matters in this ever-changing world, but there can be no lessening of its devotion to the Monroe Doctrine, because this, more than any other single aspect of policy, involves the safety of the Nation and its vital interests. Especially is this true now that by an act of Congress we are withdrawing from the Philippines and shall not be expected to defend those islands.

Obviously, our military establishment must be adequate to carry out the obligation so clearly implied in the Monroe Doctrine—the obligation to prevent the extension of foreign political domination through military action in the Western Hemisphere. This may well be considered as part of the supreme obligation to defend the continental United States. We thus envision our whole defense. Without the Panama Canal we should be sadly handicapped. It is our life-line and must be maintained.

For our defense in the Pacific we believe the mission of our Military Establishment is the maintenance, impregnably, of the line following roughly the 180th meridian, commencing at the Alaskan islands, passing somewhat westward of Hawaii, and thence generally southeastward to include and cover the Panama Canal. With comparatively slight additions our presently authorized military strength, both Army and Navy, is equal to that particular task.

We conceive the disposition of our military forces in the Atlantic and the Pacific as having a common objective—the enforcement of our defense policy. We should look upon Oahu as an outpost not only of our Pacific coast, but of the Canal. We should look upon Guantanamo and Puerto Rico, and our naval and aviation establishments along our Atlantic coast as likewise outposts of Panama. Everything should be done to extend and strengthen such outposts in the areas of defense, whether they be in the hands of the Army or the Navy.

As for Panama itself, there is great need of a substantial increase in the strength of the garrison, in order that the armament now there, or shortly to be installed, may be manned with at least one shift; and we must add certain equipment vital to the conduct of its defense.

If we control the sea and the air over a wide radius from the Canal, it will not be easy for an enemy to reach it from the sea. Likewise, if, when the need arises, we take instant measures to prevent the establishment of hostile bases in Central or South America, we shall have gone a long way toward closing the door.

With our defense system made effective far out in the Pacific and far out in the Atlantic, with hostile military infiltration promptly prevented, and with the Canal itself fortified to the utmost degree of effectiveness, we shall be secure in the western world. Such should be our military policy—such must be our defense.

THE VITAL IMPORTANCE OF A SOUND NATIONAL ECONOMY

(Submitted to the House March 12, 1940)

In the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress the Republican minority united in adopting and putting forward a statement defining and clarifying the policy of national defense which they believed should appeal to the Congress and to the people. That statement of policy was presented to the House of Representatives. Subsequent action of the Congress was such as to justify the belief that this statement of policy and of the mission of our military forces in defense of it met with general approval. Nothing has occurred since then to alter this belief. Further study prompts the minority to submit to the House some considerations which it deems to be of the utmost importance at this time.

Our concern is heightened and intensified by what we see going on all over the world today. Recent events strengthen our determination that we shall remain at peace, and secure in that peace. As we plan for security we mean security not only in the physical or material sense, but, taking the long view, the security of our free institutions.

Our thoughts now turn to the present condition of our military services. In order that they shall be able to perform the mission assigned to them, it is obvious that we need them in adequate strength. It is when we come to give consideration to the strength of the services—not only strength in numbers but especially strength in material and equipment of all kinds—that we find ourselves confronting a difficult and complicated circumstance. It is conceded, we believe, that both the Army and Navy should be stronger if our military defense is to be adequate. We believe, further, that there would be little hesitation on the part of the Congress in adding very substantially to the present-day strength, especially in equipment, were it not for that circumstance which confronts us and which we must not ignore.

To reach a better understanding of it we must reexamine the broad outline of our participation in the World War. Upon doing so we are reminded that when we entered that war, in April of 1917, the national debt stood at $1,100,000,000. In the 18 months of our participation we spent something in excess of $35,000,000,000. To meet that expenditure we raised about ten billions through taxes. We borrowed the remainder and came out of the World War with a national debt of twenty-six billions. That wartime financing was accomplished with comparative ease, for when we began it the Government owed very little.

Compare that to our present situation. For 8 or 9 years the Federal Treasury has been running in the red. Through all of these years we have been spending much more than we have collected from taxes. The more we have spent the more we have borrowed. As a result, we have piled up a huge national debt. Present law provides that the national debt shall not exceed forty-five billions. It is now conceded that by the end of this fiscal year, June 30, 1940, the direct bonded debt will have approached forty-four billions. If our spending in the near future goes on at anything like the recent rate, the forty-five billion limit will be reached, the Congress will have to raise the limit, and we shall continue plunging along the reckless road.

Let us remember, therefore, that should we be drawn into a war of first magnitude we should have to start with a debt of at least forty-four billions, probably more, and then finance the effort on top of that debt. It is a prospect which must concern every thoughtful person in the land.

The President himself gave evidence of his concern when, in his message to the Congress, he suggested the imposition of a special tax calculated to produce revenue sufficient to meet the additional burden of the national defense and at the same time avoid the necessity of increasing the debt limit. While we share the President's apparent concern, we are convinced that the imposition of an additional special national-defense tax would be inadequate as a remedy and essentially unsound. It would not reach the heart of the problem.

No one at this time can foresee accurately the measures we might have to employ were we drawn into war, but all of us can visualize the danger to our institutions were we forced to resort to inflation, to confiscation, and ultimate repudiation. Could our free institutions survive such a strain? Similar institutions have perished in other lands within our time. Driven to such expedients, it might well be that we shall have failed actually in our defense.

Such a possibility should convince us that the most serious weakness in the armor of our national defense today is the existence of a national debt of $44,000,000,000. There it stands, towering, ominous. Much as we should like to, we cannot consider our problem solely in terms of soldiers and sailors, of divisions and battleships.

To deny that a healthy economic condition is vital to our national defense would be absurd. Our ability to mobilize and maintain the resources of the country in a major effort depends fundamentally upon the strength of our national economy. True, we need soldiers and sailors, divisions and battleships, with adequate modern equipment, but to secure their effectiveness in a long, grueling struggle, and at the same time to preserve our institutions, we must mend our ways.

It will not be an easy task. We have acquired a habit difficult to cast off. Many of our people, thoughtless of the consequences, laugh at debt and demand that spending shall go on. But it must be curbed, for we cannot go on this way and be secure in this troubled world.

The maintenance of our defense is linked with the maintenance of all other necessary activities of our Government. At the present juncture we cannot separate one from the other. The cost of the whole of them combined must be our concern as we strive to put our house in order.

To put it simply, our plea is that the Congress, and others in high authority, reestablish thrift as a virtue in the conduct of government, as it is a virtue in the conduct of the individual.

Below is the text of the announcement by Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., of Massachusetts, Republican leader in the House, on January 23, 1939, when the Special Conference Committee on National Defense was appointed:

"In recognition of the enlarged emphasis upon armaments and defense in the Seventy-sixth Congress, the Republican conference of the House unanimously has directed establishment of a Special Conference Committee on National Defense, to examine with particular care the rearmament proposals of the administration.

"The committee will be composed of 13 Members, with Representative JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York, designated as chairman.

"National defense is in no sense a partisan issue, but it is a large concern of national policy which touches directly the welfare, prosperity, and security of every home in the land. In this aspect of the discussion, the Republican Members of the House recognize a great responsibility to the American people, that they shall exert every proper influence on the side of orderly and deliberative legislative procedure.

"In an extended executive session on January 20 the conference surveyed the whole field of foreign relations and defense, and agreed upon three principal concerns of Republican legislative policy, as follows:

"(1) To insure a sound integration of the land, naval, air, and industrial segments of the defense program in the interest of maximum efficiency and economy.

"(2) To invite a clear definition of the fixed foreign policy of the United States, as a measuring rod for the whole scheme of defense; and

"(3) To make certain that the projected rearmament program shall be directed exclusively to the defense and security of the Nation, rather than toward dangerous intervention in the international frictions and discords of other peoples.

"The Republican Party is committed to the proposition that the American people are determined to direct their energies, not toward war, but toward peace.

"In addition to the chairman, I have appointed the following Members to the special Committee on National Defense:

"MELVIN J. MAAS, of Minnesota, and RALPH E. CHURCH, of Illinois, from the Committee on Naval Affairs;

"WALTER G. ANDREWS, of New York, and DEWEY SHORT, of Missouri, from the Committee on Military Affairs;

"D. LANE POWERS, of New Jersey, and J. WILLIAM DITTER, of Pennsylvania, from the Army and Navy subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee;

"LELAND M. FORD, of California, representing the Pacific States;

"HENRY C. DWORSHAK, of Idaho, representing the Mountain States;

"EARL R. LEWIS, of Ohio, representing the Central West;

"RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH, of Massachusetts, representing New England;

"JAMES W. MOTT, of Oregon, representing the Pacific Northwest; and

"THOMAS E. MARTIN, of Iowa, representing the agricultural States.

"THE CAPITOL,

War Propaganda, 1917 and 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, under permission granted, I present for publication in the RECORD another of the articles referred to by me at that time as being part of a series entitled "Twenty-five Years Ago."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOTION PICTURES AND PROPAGANDA

Today, motion pictures are a part of American life. They exert a large influence with our citizens.

Some motion-picture producers are misusing the screen for war propaganda. Part of this is being done to make money. Part of it is to carry out the wishes of those who produce the shows and who are hopeful that this country become a participant.

It is announced that James Roosevelt is to distribute a film recognized as one to generate hate and bitterness, which in turn promotes a spirit of war hysteria.

The use of motion pictures for war propaganda in 1914–17 was limited because the pictures were not such a powerful influence as they are today. But this part of approach to the people of the United States was not overlooked. Miss Winifred Johnston, in her Memo on the Movies, a discussion of war propaganda from 1914–39, gives some interesting facts about the subject.

WAR PROPAGANDA, 1914–39

"What is truth?" said jesting Pilate. Sometimes the question would seem to be the actuating principle of propagandists as a whole and those of the movies in particular.

As propaganda the motion picture shares the seeming virtue of all photography; its evidence appears on the face of it to be unassailable. This is because it rests upon an assumption of truth to facts. The photograph is, first of all, assumed to be true in itself; that is, not "faked" or "doctored" in the actual negative or print. Secondly, the undoctored film is in turn assumed to represent the veriest reality, the "real" person, or the "real" happening.

How often this is untrue is just beginning to be perceived. The distortions of the "candid" photograph (particularly when assisted by unnatural angles and viewpoints) are only an indication of how the "real person" may be weirdly or viciously misrepresented in size, feature, and demeanor. But was the person real to begin with? Or was this individual only an actor—accomplished or unconscious—assuming for the occasion of the picture, the name, garb, and identity desired by the photographer?

Events have proved that photographers as well as photographs can lie. With the movies this danger becomes still more acute as news reels and documentaries are cut and assembled rather than being presented in their original continuities. When events are actually re-created for the camera, as in the March of Time and many semiofficial war movies, the editorial interpretation is inevitable. The whole sequence, as well as each enacted episode, must necessarily be considered as questionable—opinion rather than fact.

"I saw it in a picture," the naive say, and are inclined to consider their evidence as not to be denied. So the assumption of truth to facts persists and works its will in picture magazines and newsreels. Far too few are the inquiries as to the identity or motives of the owners of the magazine and theater or of the creators and distributors of the pictures themselves.

So strong is this illusion of reality that it hangs over theatrical movies as well as news reels. The propagandistic value of theatrical movies is actually double. The assumption of truth to facts which belongs to this peculiar medium—as it does, through another sense, to radio also—is further enhanced by that illusion of reality which is the quality of art. Children especially are susceptible to convictions arising from story movies. So are unsophisticated people in general—whether primitive or civilized. Even the literate and knowing find it difficult to separate themselves from the strong emotional appeal begotten of the identification that takes place between audience and hero. For these in particular, the better the movie, the better the propaganda.

News reels are obviously weapons in this psychological attack. But theatrical pictures also have their usefulness in impressing old and young with the final and conclusive idea—that war is a glorious means to a good end.

Films creating such opinion can be divided roughly into three groups. These may be listed, according to their purposes, in the chronological order in which they usually appear:

I. War itself is depicted as decisive, heroic, romantic. The glory of war is presented by means of glittering generalities, honor, liberty, democracy, empire, and what is known as card stacking—omission of facts, underemphasis of some facts, overemphasis of others, general distortion.

II. One of the sides is depicted as good—brave—a force for righteousness and civilization. The heroes are indicated by the device of transfer—presenting the characters or nations on that side in terms that rouse favorable connotations in the audience. Thus the term "democratic nations" includes in various propagandas such diverse governments and practices as those represented by the countries of North and South America, Great Britain, France, Russia, Turkey; and the term "law abiding nations" is applied to those nations willing to abide by the laws they made to favor themselves. If the audience can be thus led to identify itself continuously and sympathetically with these idealized heroes, the desires and ends of these protagonists are gradually accepted as desires and ends that not only are admirable but that also belong to the audience.

3. The other side—when at last selected—is depicted as brutal, depraved, lacking in abilities, decencies, and charm, a force for evil and barbarism. The villains are made repulsive and frightful by such devices as card stacking, transfer, and name calling (Huns, aggressors, godless nations, killer of women and children).

Records show that the screens of the world are always full of movies depicting war as decisive, heroic, and romantic. The side that is presented as good, brave, and righteous largely depends upon whose money financed the picture. Whatever party, country, or institution is claimed by the financial powers back of the movies will naturally be peopled by heroes—men whose cause has been uniformly right in the eyes of God and man—as proved by the historical pictures financed by these owners. Enough of these historical epics will be on the screens at all times to keep their audiences convinced that the financial agent's side has been the right side in all the critical moments of the world. The band-wagon device will urge the audience's loyalties by depicting that side not only as right but also as uniformly victorious.

"When the last group of pictures begins to appear—movies depicting a villain for the people to hate—the nations are usually already on their road to war."

Think! As you see some of the films now being shown on the screen, have you not seen the villain to be one of the belligerents of the present war?

Miss Johnston also gives this interesting data:

"The need was to create and sustain a war temper," Harry Alan Potamkin has written, repeating almost exactly the words of some of these civic leaders, "to eliminate all doubts, and to extract devotion, moral and material. The impressionable directors set to. Thomas Ince, producer of Civilization, emitted Viva la France. Slogan films were plentiful: Over There, To Hell With the Kaiser, For France, Lest We Forget. Love for our brothers in arms was instilled by films, domestic and imported, such as The Belgian, Daughters of France, Sarah Bernhardt in Mothers of France. * * * The vestiges of admiration for Germany were eliminated by films like The Kaiser, Beast of Berlin, The Prussian Cur, The Hun Within. A miniature Joan, Baby Peggy, joined the abominable harangue that children spat on fathers of families: "Don't be a slacker." An insidious propaganda among children was instituted and developed. The nonmilitary Boy Scouts had films made especially for them: Pershing's Crusaders, The Star-Spangled Banner, The War Waif, Your Flag and My Flag, serials like The English Boy Scouts to the Rescue, and Ten Adventures of a Boy Scout. The objector was shamed by 'don't bite the hand that's feeding you' movies: My Own United States, A Call to Arms, The Son of Democracy, The Man Without a Country, Draft 258, The Unbeliever, The Great Love, One More American, The Man Who Was Afraid. German atrocities were insisted upon: The Woman the Germans Shot. All branches of the service were gilded, Submarine D–2. * * * Douglas Fairbanks jumped from a roof for $100 for the Red Cross and Chaplin sold autographed halves of his hat. * * * The movie actors joined the California Coast Artillery; others organized the Lasky Home Guards. * * * The popular star, Robert Warwick, now a captain, was quoted in the fan press upon war's ennobling qualities."

For a while at least the propaganda worked. Even Carl Laemmle, as war came nearer the United States, responded, as did the millions of his compatriots. By the end of 1917 he had arranged for an impressive sheet of messages to be circulated through the motion-picture houses. The Vice President, Thomas Marshall, headed the list. Mr. Lloyd George and Lord Northcliffe followed with General Pershing, Cardinal Gibbons, members of the Cabinet, Ambassadors, university presidents, State Governors, and United States Senators, all whipping up the people's war fever and declaring that their slogan should be "Peace never until forever."

One message arrived too late for inclusion in this theater harrangue. It was from William Jennings Bryan, who had resigned from his office as Secretary of State rather than sign the second Lusitania note to Germany in 1915.

Very simply it declared: "When, except in case of invasion, declarations of war are submitted to the people for ratification before hostilities begin—then ambitious rulers and greedy commercial interests will be unable to plunge nations into unnecessary conflicts."

SAMUEL GOLDWYN

I recently gave to the Senate data on those who paid for the advertisements to get us more involved in the present conflict. One of those individuals who helped to pay for the advertisements was Samuel Goldwyn. This is not his first interest in such matters. Miss Johnson gives some data on the producer in the following words:

"When Adolph Zukor combined his Famous Players with the Lasky-Goldfish-DeMille organization in 1916, the man who was born Samuel Goldfish withdrew, taking $1,000,000 for his interest. By Christmas of the same year, Goldfish had effected a combination with Edgar Selwyn in the Goldwyn Pictures Corporation (whose name Goldfish finally adopted by law as his own).

"The Goldwyn concern specialized in authors. In his biography Goldwyn claims that Zukor countered by importing from England such writers as Arnold Bennett, Eleanor Glynn, and Sir Gilbert Parker. Eleanor Glynn was a confessed propagandist for France, and Sir Gilbert Parker was head of the American section (or Ministry of Information) of the British War Propaganda Bureau. In his history of the movies Terry Ramsaye states that it was Goldwyn who signed their contracts. The significant point is that these recognized Allied propagandists should be offered the freedom of American screens as they had already achieved domination of American lecture platforms.

"Goldwyn's first film, as a matter of fact, was not released until about the time the United States made formal announcement of its entry in the war. Before the war ended Goldwyn had enlisted the financial support of Frank Joseph Godsol, an American-born citizen of France, who had made a fortune in buying and selling war supplies in France. Godsol in turn interested the Du Ponts and other capitalists to the sum of $7,000,000 in cash. 'With this capitalization,' Goldwyn has said, 'all my financial struggles ended.'"

THEATER PROPAGANDA, 1916–17

Walter Millis, editorial writer for the New York Herald Tribune, notes in his book, The Road to War, the feeling of the motion-picture audiences preceding the last war. Let us read some statements from his book:

"The public which devoured these exposures of the Teutonic system of corruption and distortion of American opinion was but dimly conscious of the many systems operating to the same end on behalf of the Entente. When, in September, a motion picture made up of war films collected from within the Central Powers was released in New York it offered the American public practically its first chance * * * to see anything on the screen that admitted there were two sides to the war. But it was also in September that another and far more moving product of the cinematographic art received its first showing. This memorable addition to the pictorial backgrounds of the war years sprang from the marriage of two great minds. Into the hands of Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, a leading motion-picture producer of the spectacular school, there had fallen a copy (it seems to have fallen into the hands of nearly every literate person in the United States) of Mr. Hudson Maxim's Defenseless America. The commodore read it in a night and sprang for the motion-picture rights; the result was The Battle Cry of Peace.

"Hundreds of thousands of Americans were to witness this gory piece of incomparable propaganda for preparedness. They were to be thrilled and horrified by its portrayal of an unprepared America overrun by the brutal and licentious soldiery of a foreign power which, though unnamed, uniformed its troops in a strangely close imitation of the Germans. Assisted by tons of smoke powder and regiments of supers, Miss Norma Talmadge and Mr. Charles Richman personified the Nation in the agonies of an invasion far more horrible—and more exciting—than anything depicted in the censored films of the real war in Europe. Commodore Blackton's masterpiece, according to an historian of the motion picture, won warm endorsement from the belligerently minded, most conspicuously from Col. Theodore Roosevelt—national exploitation of the picture began; and it was soon inculcating an enthusiasm for big armament appropriations and fears and hatred for the Germans in theaters throughout the length and breadth of the United States."

HOLLYWOOD, SEPTEMBER 1939

Now, let us move the calendar 25 years to the beginning of the present world war.

Variety, one of the most informative papers of the screen and entertainment field, shows the trends toward war propaganda.

The first follows the declaration of war in September, in which it is "doubtful" in Hollywood how the war propaganda will be taken by the audience. Note the change as time progresses. The article of September 13, 1939:

"ANTIWAR FEELING IN UNITED STATES COOLS FILM-REISSUING PLANS

"Although all film distribs are rummaging through vaults for war pix that might be appropriate for reissue, they're not at all certain how many and to what degree they will hit the screens. Lists of prospective reissues are being compiled, but distribution execs are just sitting and waiting while they try to figure out which way the wind of public temper is blowing as regards things martial.

"There's a fear by officials that instead of being draws, because of their timeliness, war films may be actually repulsive to many people.

"One reissue actually being booked so far is the March of Time's Inside the Maginot Line, first released last October. It's being well received, but as it is of an educational nature it is naturally far removed from treatment of war in fictional form in an ordinary feature.

"Likely for reissue is RKO's Woman I Love (Miriam Hopkins and Paul Muni), originally released in April 1937. Muni plays French World War ace. RKO also is considering Lost Squadron for reissue.

"U NOT SURE OF DUO

"Universal during the past week has screened All Quiet on the Western Front and its sequal Road Back. Because the German soldiers and average German citizen is treated sympathetically in the film, there is some question as to what the response would be, in view of current feeling against all things pertaining to the Reich.

"Columbia recently turned out Clouds Over Europe, which will definitely not be reissued, partially because it was released only a short time ago and partially because it did tepid business. Col will, however, on September 30 release a new war film which is believed to be particularly well-timed, U-Boat 29.

"United Artists has under consideration Things To Come, with Raymond Massey, which originally unreeled in April 1936. If the war fever is decided a good bet to capitalize on, this is expected to be a particularly strong release because of the added stature Massey has gained in the legit production of Abe Lincoln.

"Monogram has resurrected Navy Secrets, a spy story, but isn't giving it much consideration. Metro, Par, Fox, and Republic either have nothing suitable or won't reissue anything.

WAR IS FACTOR IN BROADWAY FOLDS OF "ME" AND "WAY"

Decision to withdraw The American Way, at the Center, New York, September 23, and the probable closing of Leave It To Me, Imperial, Saturday (16) were week-end developments. The war may be partly responsible in curtailing attendance at both shows, scripts in each case having political contexts, comic in "Me" and serious in "Way." Preservation of United States neutrality ideals is said to have been a factor in lifting "Way," particularly since the drama is pointedly anti-Nazi. However, both suspended engagements after the late spring slump that attended the opening of the New York World's Fair, indicating that resumptions are difficult operations, although there have been exceptions.

By October, one finds this situation in Hollywood about propaganda films:

ANTI-NAZI SCRIPTS SHELVED BUT WAR THEMES GO ON

Desire of American producers to sidestep anything that might cause a finger to be pointed at them as violators of this country's neutrality has resulted in the indefinite shelving of at least 10 stories which were already bought and in some cases ready for the cameras.

Warner Bros. is believed to have the largest number of this type of property, mostly anti-Nazi, on hand. Among four or five they are reported to be holding up is the biography of Niemoller, German pastor, who was a U-boat commander in the last war and is now in a concentration camp. Another is Underground, story of the alleged secret movement within Germany to overthrow Hitler.

Metro has three anti-Nazi pieces which it has decided to allow to gather dust. They are I Had a Comrade, by Viscount Castlerose; Flotsam, by Erich Remarque; and The Mortal Storm, by Phyliss Bottome. Twentieth-Fox is understood to have two or three stories similarly on the shelf, one of which is I Married a Nazi, formerly tagged Swastika, by Oscar Schisgall.

An unusual situation has arisen with Escape, a book which was published by Little, Brown about a month ago and is rapidly becoming a best seller. It ran in the Saturday Evening Post as a serial. Although it has what might be looked upon as an anti-Nazi angle, it is being eyed by story editors. Book is understood written by a well-known author under the pseudonym of Ethel Vance, because she has relatives in Germany.

Aside from the anti-Nazi pix, practically all producers are going ahead with war films.

ARMS REPEAL AND BOX OFFICE

The lifting of the arms embargo was watched in Hollywood with much interest. But the headline of the story says "Arms repeal to boom box office." The story follows:

"ARMS REPEAL TO BOOM BOX OFFICE—BIGGEST GROSS FORECAST FOR 1940—SECTORS SUPPLYING WAR NEEDS CAN'T HELP BENEFITING, ESPECIALLY EAST OF THE MISSISSIPPI—75 PERCENT OF REVENUE THERE

"'If peace doesn't break out,' as one theater operating executive of a major producer-distributor puts it, the arms embargo repeal should react to the benefit of film box offices within 2 or 3 months, and, on a continuance of the war, send 1940 into new and highest ground since the 1929 sinking.

"The fact that the great majority of receipts comes from communities east of the Mississippi that are important in the field of manufacturing or produce (wheat, cotton, oil, etc.) makes it doubly conclusive that if the arms embargo repeal is to set off a boom, the result on industry books is going to be very positive.

"It is estimated that about 75 percent of the rental returns and the gross admissions are from east of the Mississippi, although throughout portions of the Midwest in the farming belt and in the Southwest in oil and cotton territory, the reaction at the box office on war prosperity could be very important beyond the river.

"The experience of the last war was that the theaters didn't begin to ride the boom that was developed until about 6 months of fighting had gone on. That experience may be duplicated this time, also, as manufacturing progress and growing gets deeper under way in the face of increased market demands.

"Grosses are now running ahead of the same time last year but reported in theater statistical quarters that the tendency during the past 3 weeks has been to show signs of weakening a little instead of strengthening in spite of the fact the pictures on release are of normal quality or better.

"While the failure of grosses to forge ahead at this time is causing some pessimism, in view of pictures available on the market, operators believe this is due at the moment to the uncertainties that exist, the weeks of consideration of the arms embargo repeal in Washington, and possibly, for a time yet, the doubt as to what the repeal will mean to business generally.

"It is confidently believed that if a boom is to come, neither Washington nor anything else can stop profiteering and the soaring of prices, all of which would redound to the benefit of the theaters and enable upping of prices here and there. What would greatly rose-color the situation when the country is taken as a whole on grosses, would be the sudden return to life of scores of cities and towns where manufacturing has been at a very low ebb for years. This would also be true of farming communities which have suffered."

THE LION HAS WINGS

By January the British-produced The Lion Has Wings appeared in this country. It will be recalled that members of the United States Senate Naval and Military Affairs Committees were invited to be special guests at the Washington showing. I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD material about this incident.

Variety has this to say in its January 24 issue:

"First of the official British propaganda pictures to reach the United States since the outbreak of hostilities, The Lion Has Wings, demonstrates how film propaganda, as well as the other instruments of warfare, have progressed since the last war. Which isn't to say that this picture is a masterpiece. Far from it. But at least it's much more skillful than anything of the kind heretofore shown. As has been observed before, the English are shrewd propagandists.

"Film is part dramatic and part documentary. First portion is aimed to justify Britain's war stand, while the second part dramatizes the development and activities of the Royal Air Force. Although it presents nothing that hasn't been repeated over and over before, the early part dealing with the alleged war guilt is rather impressive. Using shots of Hitler addressing the Reichstag and purporting to take the Fuehrer's own words, it shows time and again how he made solemn pledges to the German people and the other nations. Then in each case the picture shows scenes of Nazi troops marching into territory which Hitler had promised not to violate. Thus a map of Germany and its surrounding countries is used to illustrate how the Nazi swallowed smaller nation after nation into the present Reich. In that part of the picture Producer Korda has even gone back to 1914 to revive the incident of the German Ambassador railing at the British for going to war over a 'scrap of paper.'

"After that argumentative (and reasonably convincing) portion, the picture swings into the dramatic story of the air force. First is heard the voice of Chamberlain addressing Parliament and broadcasting the declaration of war against Germany; and, as the scene shifts to a private home in London, Merle Oberon is shown listening to the radio. In one of the two or three genuinely affecting moments of the picture she and another girl silently listen as the Prime Minister concludes and the strains of God Save the King are heard.

"That leads into the human story that runs faintly through the rest of the film. But most of the dramatic portion stresses more the manufacture of munitions and planes for the war in the air. While much of the munitions-making shots are routine stuff, a few bits are instructive. And the parts dealing with the plan of defending England against air raids is intensely interesting. Reenacted air battles with raiding squadrons and the restaged Royal Air Force raid on the Nazi pocket battleships in the Kiel Canal are too obviously one-sided to be convincing, however. As one Missourian in the audience remarked loudly, 'If it's as easy as that, the war'd already be over.'

"Even so, the picture has undeniably logical arguments in the earlier portions and abounds in graphically effective air shots and illuminating technical details in the latter portions. If the dramatic story is humdrum and the acting negligible, the picture is still far above par in entertainment—for propaganda. And because of its timely quality and the obvious United States sympathy for its viewpoint, the film should also coin a neat profit."

Note that it is "far above par in entertainment—for propaganda." Also that the film "should coin a neat profit." A combination of propaganda and profit—something that is not unusual in war propaganda.

But the resentment caused the picture to be picketed. The two incidents recorded follow:

[Variety, Wednesday, April 24, 1940]

"LION HAS WINGS PICKETED IN ST. LOUIS AS PROPAGANDA

"ST. LOUIS, April 23.—Five 'nabes'—the Esquire, Norside, Uptown, Ritz, and Varsity—were picketed several days last week for showing the British made The Lion Has Wings (UA-Korda), which was shown for the first time locally in these houses. Members of the St. Louis Chapter of the League of Draftable Men, organized ostensibly to maintain neutrality in the United States, constituted the pickets.

"One, decked out in a silk hat, frock coat, and totin' an umbrella to resemble Premier Chamberlain, paraded in front of the Ritz. At all houses dodgers were distributed inviting passers-by to see the feature. The dodgers were signed 'Neville Chamberlain and Winston Churchill.' The pickets asserted the flicker was British propaganda and should not be shown. L. A. Bornero, general manager of the Ansell Bros. circuit, which owns and operates the Ritz and Varsity, said the film was booked for entertainment and it was not considered British propaganda.

"The picture shows British war preparations and is similar to a newsreel with a story starring Merle Oberon. An attaché at one of the theaters said the picketing bolstered the box office.

"SAN DIEGO DISTURBANCE

"SAN DIEGO, April 23.—Disturbance broke out in California (F-WC) here during blind preview of The Lion Has Wings. Member of audience shouted 'We don't want propaganda.'

"Someone answered, 'If you don't like it, why don't you go home?'

"Original voice shrieked, 'I think I will.'

"Commotion brought A. Roberts, manager, to scene. He escorted agent to box office, refunded admission, and sent him on his way."

CHANGING SENTIMENT

You will recall how the theatrical producers had fear about using war films in September of 1939. This had changed by June of 1940 when one finds noted that Noel Coward's Cavalcade would be revised. The story of the reissue:

"Principal hitch to whether the play will be done on Broadway in the fall is the uncertainty of what the war and international developments may be in the meantime. It was at first feared that Cavalcade would arouse audience resentment because of its pro-British flavor, but it is now figured that public sentiment in the United States has changed so rapidly that phase would be acceptable. However it is a question whether Coward can minimize the drama's defeatist attitude toward war without weakening it theatrically."

Then, a most interesting part of the story is given to the readers:

"After a couple of months' visit in the United States, the playwright clippered back to Europe last Sunday to resume his official duties in Paris for the British Government."

Link the two paragraphs together and note the reasons.

LORD LOTHIAN TELLS ACTORS TO STAY HERE

Speaking of the value of actors in the American theater, Lord Lothian was quoted by the British consul in Los Angeles that the British actors "were doing a far better job for their country by continuing their professional work and representing British character on the screen than by going into combat units."

The British consul, Eric Martin Cleuth, declared that he had gone to Washington to talk to Lord Lothian about these actors and that the judgment was that they were "doing a far better job for their country" by remaining here in the United States.

The British actors resented a statement by Sir Seymour Hicks who had said that these actors were "gallantly facing the footlights" in the United States.

Laurence Olivier and Herbert Wilcox replied that they had been informed by British authorities that they would be doing the best possible service to their country by remaining in the United States and representing the British character.

They were enlisted in the war service of England, the service of propaganda in the United States.

In the new book War Propaganda and the United States the authors discuss the fact that Lord Lothian has not overlooked this motion-picture propaganda:

"Lord Lothian staged the first major Hollywood coup. He conferred with George J. Schaefer, president of R. K. O., and at the conference a picture was born. Schaefer agreed to advance capital to finance a production which would be created entirely by French and British performers in Hollywood, with the proceeds allocated to Anglo-French relief agencies. R. K. O. also consented to distribute the film at actual cost. Among those who immediately volunteered to act were Brian Aherne, Charles Boyer, Cary Grant, Vivien Leigh, Charles Laughton, Victor Saville, and Herbert Wilcox. A great theme was expected to be chosen."

A glance at some of the pictures is very interesting:

FILM REVIEWS

Notes from the film-review sections:

AN ENGLISHMAN'S HOME

"Starting slowly, the story gains in impetus as it goes along. Designed for propaganda, it will serve its purpose and should do business in this country." (Variety.)

TORPEDOED

"In many ways the picture is strong propagandic, but no complaint will be raised about that. The box-office potentialities are fairly promising." (Variety.)

MAD MEN OF EUROPE

"Film, which tends to showcase the 'invasion' of England by Nazi parachutists, is hysterically shrieking, inept propaganda. The market for this one in the United States should be decidedly limited despite the vast exploitation possibilities." (Variety.)

PASTOR HALL

"Purely and simply a denunciation against nazi-ism. As such it is tremendously effective and should be valuable propaganda for the Allies." (Variety.)

BEASTS OF BERLIN

"Its treatment is precisely the sort calculated to inflame mob passions during a period of growing hysteria. As propaganda it may have some effect, since it's all easily understood and likely to appeal to ready hatreds." (Variety.)

"CONFESSIONS OF A NAZI SPY—PACKS BIGGER PUNCH TODAY

"Confessions of a Nazi Spy, which returned in a reissue to the Metropolitan yesterday, is vastly more important in many ways now than it was the first time, primarily because you will see it in such an entirely different light.

"The picture first appeared more than a year ago as an exposé of a sensational spy trial then just completed in the United States District Court in New York, involving 18 persons convicted of stealing military secrets for a foreign power. We thought of it mostly as a scandal, and of the German-American Bund meetings it so vividly pictures as something slightly fantastic. Few, if any, of us took it seriously.

"Today we are faced with the actual possibility of invasion, and the Nation is in the midst of a tremendous effort to arm quickly, sufficiently, and without hysteria. Simply put, the Nation a year ago thought of all these things as remote. Today they are desperately close to home. That was evidenced by the alternate hissing, booing, and applause that yesterday afternoon's audience at the Metropolitan expressed continuously.

"Though the show has no outstanding stars, Edward G. Robinson as the Chief of the Federal Bureau of Investigation is as close to the lead as anyone. Francis Lederer as the deluded would-be spy, George Sanders as the Nazi contact man, and Paul Lukas as the bund leader and American fuehrer are all excellent. Also the steadying influence of the United States attorney by Henry O'Neill is gratifying.

"To take us another step along in the scene, the Metropolitan offers some excellent films of the Allied retreat from Dunkirk, now hailed as a military miracle." (Washington Daily News.)

MORTAL STORM

"It is not the first anti-Nazi picture to come from Hollywood. A remake of an earlier blast, openly titled 'Confessions of a Nazi Spy,' is plying a return engagement just down the street at the Met. Out at the Open Air this week is something called Hitler, the Beast of Berlin. Both hit at the same madness, the one exposing its inroads over here, the other purporting to show its ultimate horror over there. Both are shocking, sensational, frantic tirades." (Washington Daily News.)

WAR SPIRIT IN WASHINGTON

A glance at the newspapers in Washington will give an insight to the use of the screen to build up the war spirit. In the Daily News of May 18, 1940, one will find this comment:

"WAR ECHOES HIT NEW HIGH AT TRANS LUX

"The drums of war form the pit orchestra at the Trans Lux this week. After we see amazing pictures of total war in Europe in all its phases and its savage suddenness. Mr. Roosevelt talks to a stirred Congress and legislators and executives reecho his determination to make this country ready for any emergency. It's difficult to view all the scenes from abroad and our own official alarm without feeling a flicker of hysteria.

"Years of Hollywood spectacles have dulled us to wholesale fires and destruction, but the knowledge that all of this was grimly real and happening with lightning devastation kept the audience on the edges of its seats last night.

"Most graphic is the burning of Namsos in Norway, after being fired by the German bombers."

Then, note the words of Sidney Rogerson as to how the United States would be propagandized for our entrance into war. Here are Mr. Robertson's words:

"Similarly with news-reel men. They should be the first to be allowed to 'shoot' horror pictures of air raids in order that the proper volume of pictorial horror will be available in one of the few great countries where 'atrocity propaganda' will still be operative."

One week later, one finds this comment:

"In the Trans Lux bill of the news reel this week, the war is made so vivid you can picture yourself, almost too easily, in place of Europe's unfortunates. Pictures that would be called maudlin if they had been authored in Hollywood, like the shots of Poland's bombed hospitals and churches, are far too real to evoke anything but horror in their audiences. * * * Other news shows the Germans consolidating their positions in Norway and their air force raining bombs on Belgium and France."

In June 1, 1940 issue, the audience reaction is discussed in the following manner:

APPLAUSE AND HISSES GREET NEWS REELS AT TRANS LUX

Sustained applause for Senator CLAUDE PEPPER'S fiery interventionist speech and hisses for shots of Messrs. Count Ciano and Hitler by audiences at the Trans Lux's new show this week provide a dramatic cross section of current public opinion."

"Skillful news handling by the film editors—which put the sickening scenes of hospitals deliberately bombed by the Nazis just before shots of Senator PEPPER'S speech—might have been responsible, but the audience's reaction, themselves, are almost warlike."

This review, of course, must be short. Only a small number of references could be given but they indicate the use of the motion pictures for war propaganda. One of the first things in successful war propaganda is to generate hate. Part of the films being shown in the United States are in that category, to spread hate. To get people ready to enter war requires this development.

It is to be regretted that the motion pictures which should be for entertainment help build a psychology of bitterness, which in turn destroys entertainment and brings disaster and ruin.

RADIO PROGRAM OF THE AMERICAN FORUM OF THE AIR

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following proceedings of the American Forum of the Air on Sunday, July 7, 1940:

Announcer STEPHEN MCCORMICK. Listeners from coast to coast are invited to hear the American Forum of the Air. We bring you another program presented by WOL in cooperation with WOR and emanating tonight from the Willard Room of the Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.

Information as to how you may receive a copy of tonight's proceedings will be given at the conclusion of the broadcast.

Tonight the American Forum of the Air will be presented in the form of short statements, followed by an informal panel discussion. Questions anent tonight's subject are invited from the audience here present.

This series of programs is arranged and presented by Theodore Granik, founder and director of the American Forum of the Air, as well as the American Forum, nationally syndicated newspaper feature. Mr. Granik will act as chairman and moderator.

Mr. GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. McCormick.

It will be some time before political big-wigs stop discussing the "blitzkrieg" in Philadelphia, where Republicans invaded the City of Brotherly Love to nominate their standard-bearers. It was an amazing convention—nothing exactly like it ever happened before in American politics. A new name emerged on the political scene—Wendell L. Willkie, who until a few days ago was president of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, and who stated to newspapermen that he had never considered himself a candidate until some 30 or 40 days before the convention.

As the delegates got under way, the town was a beehive of activity. All about there were rumors of deals. Everybody seemed to have inside information as to possible trades and vote switching. And there were dark horses and speeches aplenty.

But with the third day a new excitement started. Delegates were besieged by letter, telephone, and wire with a "We want Willkie" campaign and the galleries were shouting this slogan time after time, like a college yell. And while a rising suspense hung over Philadelphia, with delegates debating with each other, high pressured from all sources, managers of every candidate predicted a confident victory. Somewhat general on controversial domestic issues, the platform's foreign policy plank declared, "The Republican Party stands for Americanism, preparedness, and peace." This brought a retort from the New York Times that the Republican Party is not entitled to call itself the exclusive "peace party" of the United States.

Following the ringing nominating speeches, a tense convention awaited the balloting.

Amid the cheers of hoarse gallery-ites, early leaders began to slip. Pledged delegates switched, and slowly it became apparent that the Willkie boom was on the way to victory. In the bedlam following Senator Reed's tossing of Pennsylvania's 72 votes to the nominee, Governor Bricker, of Ohio, moved that the choice be made unanimous. Worn-out delegates returned to their hotels, to come back the following day and nominate CHARLES L. MCNARY, of Oregon, popular minority leader of the United States Senate, as Mr. Willkie's Vice Presidential running mate.

With Democrats about to gather in Chicago on July 15 to nominate their standard bearers; with speculation running wild regarding the President's third-term intentions, and Candidate Willkie's remark that he would like to "meet the Champ," everyone wants to know, "What are the chances of the G. O. P. ticket?" As legislative leaders of both parties have begun to fire their big guns for and against the platform and the candidates, the American Forum of the Air has invited four prominent Members of our Congress, two Republicans and two Democrats, to present their views tonight. Next Sunday night we hope to present a group of outstanding newspaper writers in a preview of the Democratic Convention from Chicago.

Tonight you will first hear short prepared statements by Congressman EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, Republican, of Illinois; Congressman T. V. SMITH, Democrat, also of Illinois; Congressman FRED L. CRAWFORD, Republican, of Michigan; and Congressman SAM HOBBS, Democrat, of Alabama.

Immediately following they will engage in an informal round-table extemporaneous panel discussion.

And now, our opening speaker, Congressman DIRKSEN.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

In 1932 the voters of this Nation elected Franklin D. Roosevelt by an overwhelming majority. It was not a case of placing a new party in power. It was not a case of adopting a platform. It was a case of electing a sparkling, dynamic personality. It was a case of making a change. It was a case of weariness resulting from the failure of the party in power to initiate needed reforms. It was a desire for a new emotional pattern. It was a desire for swift action. It was a case of a nation, suffering from the repeated shocks of the depression, groping for the spark that would set it right and restore recovery. It was a desire for virile and comforting leadership in an hour of acute distress. In 1940 these same factors are present to indicate that the Republican Party, under the leadership of Wendell Willkie, will prevail.

Change is eternal. Many years ago a professor at Johns Hopkins University announced a new scientific discovery. His associates promptly examined into his discovery and tore it to pieces. In desperation he asked, "Is there nothing eternal?" To this one of his associates replied: "Nothing save change." The American people have a rare gift of sportsmanship and patience. They elect a President and bear with him through trials and tribulations. They applaud his triumphs and temper the severity of their comment over his failures. Finally, the age-old instinct for change manifests itself. Call it a new trend if you will. Call it disillusionment. Call it weariness. Call it what you will. A casual examination of our history from the beginnings of the Republic indicate how effectively this instinct has operated for 160 years. It is operative today. A new trend or change is at hand and Wendell Willkie is the spearhead of that new trend.

The American people patiently abide the failures of an administration. But at long last they demand results. They want a victory over the problems which this or any other administration promises to solve. We see it in the incident of the Sangamon County farmer who, while talking to Lincoln about his prospects of election to office after so many defeats at the polls, said: "Abe, I want to support you, but somehow you never win." The people want a victory over the problem of joblessness, but after more than 7 years unemployment is still our primary problem. The farmers want a victory over the problem of inadequate prices, but that problem is still with us. The people want a victory over the problems of expanding debt and increasing taxes, but those problems are more aggravated today than at any time in the history of the Nation. After making due allowance for the many good things which the administration has accomplished, the primary problems of unemployment, low farm prices, business stagnation, debt, and taxes are still here. People will be seeking a leader who in his own field of private endeavor has evidenced remarkable results in behalf of the thousands for whom he has served as a leader and a trustee.

There must be a resurgence of the will to recover prosperity, and Wendell Willkie has the capacity for supplying the spark. How many millions of people have at one time or another said, "We are the world's wealthiest Nation. We have everything. We have natural resources, manpower, money, fertile acres, ingenuity, resourcefulness. Why don't we go forward? Why can't we have prosperity and plenty instead of distress and want? Why don't somebody do something about it?" That is despair speaking. That is frustration speaking. That is the expression of a hope that someone will supply the mystic spark to the dormant will. Defeatism must be driven away. That is why Wendell Willkie has captivated the fancy of people in all walks of life. He is regarded as the embodiment of a new trend. People will listen to him. And listening people become supporters.

Wendell Willkie brings a new emotional pattern to America. It is the pattern of plain and rugged speech coupled with a rugged conscience. He is the best example of a sterling conscience which rebels at the foibles and unfairness of government. As a trustee for 20,000 people who had millions invested in the power properties of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation he watched public funds being used to build huge generating plants to compete with his people. He saw public funds used to buy and build transmission lines with which to liquidate the investments of the citizens for whom he was a trustee. He saw P. W. A. loans and grants go to southern cities to build duplicate transmission lines with which to take away his customers and put his people out of business. He saw all this and then was forced to capitulate to an all-powerful Government and take what it offered for his properties. Who can contemplate all this without realizing that in government as elsewhere there must be a conscience to dictate the government's relationship with its citizens? Sooner or later the citizenry become acutely aware of this condition and join the following of one who embodies this philosophy. And as they follow Wendell Willkie, his party will prevail.

Mr. GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman DIRKSEN.

And now we present Congressman T. V. SMITH, of Illinois.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN T. V. SMITH

I myself believe so deeply in politics and in politicians that to me the question of who can win any election boils down to the deeper question, Who is most worthy to win it? In a two-party system, either party is worthy to win. In considering which party is this time more worthy to win, we may safely disregard the Republican platform. But for a little change of emphasis here, a little pecadillo picking there, and a little sweet carping all over the lot, the declared Republican principles are but a rehash of what it has taken the Democrats 8 years to make into acceptable doctrine.

We might say the same thing for the Republican candidate—that the Democratic Party made him possible—but the saying would not be wholly true. What is true is this: It is Mr. Roosevelt's dash and daring that nerved, not to say nagged, the Republican Party into nominating a man like Mr. Wendell Willkie. Think of the party of Harding, convivial if not corrupt; think of the party of Coolidge comfortable if not complacent; think of the party of Hoover, inept if not choleric; think of that party following Willkie—Willkie, the corporate magician, if not, with Mr. DIRKSEN, the coming mystic spark of our national resurrection. Of that you can think at all only because Mr. Roosevelt has got you used to it while getting the Republicans nerved to it. Temperamentally, Mr. Willkie is a miniature Franklin Roosevelt.

I say a "miniature" rather than a second Roosevelt for one simple, though one compelling, reason—a reason which turns on the matter of experience, negatively and positively. The plain truth is that Mr. Wendell Willkie has nearly all the wrong sort of experience and next to none of the right sort for the Presidency. Not a week in either State legislature or National Congress, nor a single day as chief executive of any American Commonwealth. Presumably he is a very able man, as he is clearly a charmer of Republican conventions. Mr. Willkie, you see, elected to go the corporate way of experience and so has naturally developed what Mr. William Allen White, a Willkie promoter, has described as "a business rather than a political mind." Let us have no misunderstanding about this: the kind of experience which Mr. Willkie has is excellent, is indeed indispensable, for what it is excellent for. But this is not the experience which fits one for something entirely different like politics. Such experience largely unfits one for democratic politics, though, I doubt not, it would be excellent in Italy, where politics is fascism and where fascism is the politics of the corporate state.

There are two reason why I hold the Willkie experience against him, and these reasons are weighty to me, still a political apprentice after 6 years' earnest effort in State legislature and National Congress.

1. The first is that corporate experience makes one an interested party in the game which government must be disinterested about. Why, it was Mr. Willkie's one-sided interest in a certain power corporation and apparently that primarily drove him out of the Democratic Party in 1936 and made him available as Republican nominee in 1940.

2. The second one is that corporate experience gets one in a certain habit of high-handedness which is very bad for democratic cooperation. (A virtue there becomes a vice here, and in an emergency it might develop into a crime.) To hire and fire in business is one thing, but to cooperate with equals in politics is quite something else again. In our form of government, the mightiest President cannot fire, nor very often hire, a single Congressman, not even the humblest. I blanched for plain Republican shame and, I may add, with a little fear for democratic procedure, when over the radio I heard Mr. Wendell Willkie in his debut before the convention say "You Republicans." Try that a few times on Congress, not to say on farmers and laborers—and then talk of national unity? Shades of unity.

To summarize: Experience in big business is not political experience save under a foreign form of government. The experience required for successful democratic politics is experience in politics itself. Of this Mr. Willkie has none. Charm developed in big business is not the kind of charm that makes democratic politics charming.

And speaking now of another thing—i. e., of who is most worthy to win in 1940—I wonder whether the American people will turn over to an utter political novice the most important political job in the world at one of the most dangerous moments of our whole national life. I wonder and doubt.

Mr. GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman T. V. SMITH.

We now present as our third speaker Congressman FRED L. CRAWFORD, of Michigan.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN FRED L. CRAWFORD

What are the chances for the G. O. P. ticket? Fundamentally, they are the best we have faced during the present century. I am a conservative in thought and deed. I was taught to be so by a grand Scotch father. Six years' service in the House and in the atmosphere of and under New Deal pressure, has not changed me. I still speak and vote conservatively, and I now submit the reasons why the G. O. P.'s chances are good.

The American people have again discovered themselves. Although they were for a number of years lulled to sleep on the pillow of "the state" and were led to believe the Government was an everlasting milk cow, they have now come back to themselves.

The present generation has had its splurge of irresponsibility; it has found that parties alone cannot conduct free government. Permitted to do so, parties will demand more and more power—and still more dictatorial power in order to be able to administer the country. If an irresponsible electorate permits, the substance of the people, as the citizen delivers it to the tax box, will be consumed by the politician as a form of manna, to perpetuate himself in office. A sleeping electorate encourages the political procurer to act as a purveyor of public funds back to the local parish in the form of "gravy." This practice dulls the conscience of the voter; destroys the fiscal structure of government; decreases pride in national life; and it leads the people to think only in terms of local projects instead of along national lines. This practice creates a localized individual selfishness that positively will not support a free government.

Government derives its just powers from the consent of those governed. National defense is much more than social reforms. Permitted to do so, the politician will, under an appropriate catch phrase, make call after call upon the people to which they will respond for more and more tax dollars. In due course the taxpaying citizen naturally questions the use of the funds and, invariably, will find the substance has been applied to promote more so-called social reforms.

This has happened in most all of the countries of western Europe, particularly in France and England. We are, I trust, quite familiar with the fact of the parallel in our own policies, here in the United States, in recent years.

Free men and women have duties to perform as well as rights to enjoy. For too many years we have had preached to us the easy way of life. God Almighty has arranged the affairs of mankind so that the idea that "government won't let you down" can remain in control for just about so long a time. Then there comes an awakening. If it comes too late, the people—like the French—become the slaves of some stronger group.

Now our people are, before it is too late, we hope, participating in a rebirth. The American voter is now in a frame of mind which demands a degree of statesmanship from his legislators. The voter now insists upon the interests of the Nation being placed before those of the individual politician and his party. Those who falsely preach that the proper duty of government is to arrange an easy way of life can no longer lead the voter.

The voters of this Nation have again determined that, under God, citizens of both sexes are going to defend their country, preserve its liberties, and bequeath to their children an opportunity to live under a free government.

For a decade the voters of this country have witnessed a debauch which, like rich food, palls their taste and becomes nauseating. They have had enough of this leveling of the Nation and the people always down to a lower level. Our people are now ready—yea! They are eager to correct and eliminate those fallacious policies which brought us near the brink of ruin. Our awakening is rude. We face a terrific task. Those who were thinking of retiring must now go back to work.

Our Nation is not yet lost; it is not yet beaten. We, the people, have made colossal errors, but we are now anxious to correct them.

The voters will now support the new leader, "Win" Willkie, and help him transform this country, and—

1. Take its natural resources and create jobs for 9,000,000 workers in private industry.

2. Break the spell gold has over us.

3. Remove the dangerous inflationary threat involved in its present status and stop the further purchases of foreign gold.

4. Put the $20,000,000,000 of gold bullion we now own directly to work for the taxpayers.

5. Prevent it from being dissipated through giving it away to the central banking systems of the world in a futile attempt to restore the so-called international gold standard.

6. Put the $1,000,000,000 worth of foodstuffs and fibers now held by a Government agency, the Commodity Credit Corporation, back into the channels of trade and then into consumption before it becomes another loss to chalk up against the taxpayer.

7. Bring life to a dying cotton South which has lost its historical cotton export market, and now definitely looms as the Nation's No. 1 economic problem.

8. Put order into Government fiscal affairs, raise the necessary funds to provide an adequate peacetime and defense Budget, and all without further destroying our private enterprise system with improperly applied taxes and more Government competition.

9. Proceed to collect a large portion of the $14,000,000,000 owed us by the European countries.

10. Prevent the dumping in our markets of loot taken from the conquered countries.

The voters will support "Win" Willkie in making our Nation strong enough to command fear, and the respect of every aggressor; stop our growing weakness, and provide a modern aircraft development to bolster our faltering military and naval program.

Understanding our American enterprise system, "Win" Willkie can weld a sound Pan American Union either on a triangular trade basis or, if forced by the totalitarian countries of Europe and Asia to do so, he can place our hemispherical defense in a position to deal blow for blow until the opposition grows weary and reasonable. entitled to public confidence and support, a party must keep itself operated by "reds." This program—this necessity—demands a leader who has no taint of the wastrel or of the fallacious philosophy of the past decade. "Win" Willkie is a graduate of the school of hard knocks.

Nominee Willkie is not a politician, therefore he will be engaged in rebuilding the physical and moral forces of this Nation instead of just playing politics. That is what the people expect and will get from him—and they will like it.

The G. O. P. is now the young people's party. The people will support the G. O. P. ticket because they know "it is back to work we go" if there are to be any more "happy days."

Mr. GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman CRAWFORD. And now as our concluding speaker in the first half of tonight's forum we present Congressman SAM HOBBS, of Alabama.

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN SAM HOBBS

The question assigned for discussion tonight, "What are the chances of the G. O. P. ticket?" is too vague to present an issue. This is deplorable.

The question, of course, is not "What chance has the G. O. P. ticket to win?" for there is no possible question as to that, and if that were the question, truthfulness would compel the only candid answer—"None."

But, phrased as it is, there are almost as many answers as there may be minds considering the question.

For instance, there is the chance for the G. O. P. immediately to contribute to the prosperity of many and the relief of unemployment by the simple expedient of hiring enough help to make this look like a real campaign. That chance is good, for their war chest, as usual, will be huge and full.

Another good chance the Republicans have is to carry a State or two other than Vermont and Maine. Some voters enjoy varying the monotony somewhat.

Still another good chance, which the G. O. P. improved greatly at Philadelphia and which is brightening every minute, is to die. Mr. Willkie himself says, "Party lines will fade in November." Should this be "the last round-up" for the elephant, I shall be among the mourners, for I like most Republicans—they're nice people; what they lack in religion they make up in education and etiquette.

This new, glamorous chauffeur of the Republican taxi may attract a few prospective fares to the old, old bus dolled up for the occasion, but there's no gasoline in its tank. It takes the gasoline of sound thinking to motivate a winning political party. To be entitled to public confidence and support, a party must keep itself abreast of the times, equipped to serve modern needs. The Democratic Party has what it takes. It is the party of progress as well as of principles; of performance rather than promises. The Republican Party, to the contrary, hasn't had a progressive thought since the Emancipation Proclamation. For 75 years the only words in the elephant's vocabulary have been "Me, too." Read the Philadelphia platform. Doesn't it O. K. everything the Democratic Party has done? Which of the great, progressive services inaugurated by the party of the people would the party of pillage repeal? Not one. Yet for 8 years the old elephant has trumpeted violent opposition to every one of these measures that he now endorses with a faint "Me, too."

But this is nothing new. Thus it hath ever been. What political blessing has ever come to America which was not achieved by the Democratic Party?

Some of the achievements of the Democratic Party:

Thomas Jefferson—Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of assembly, freedom of petition, freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures, the Louisiana Purchase.

Andrew Jackson—Yoke of the money power thrown off—abolition of the bank of the United States, acquisition of California, admission of Texas to the Union.

Grover Cleveland—Creation of the civil service.

John Tyler Morgan—The Isthmian Canal, promoting trade, and making one Navy do the duty of two for 30 years.

Woodrow Wilson—Federal Reserve System, Federal farm-loan banks, Underwood tariff law, Burnett restricted immigration law, Bankhead good-roads law, Muscle Shoals development, World War insurance, compensation and bonus, budget system, Oliver creation of Appropriations Committee, Parcel Post Service.

Franklin D. Roosevelt—Banks saved; Steagall insurance of bank deposits law; business saved (national income upped from thirty-eight to sixty billion dollars); unemployment reduced; bread and soup lines eliminated; wages increased, hours shortened, working and living conditions improved; sweatshops and child labor abolished; farm income doubled; system of farm credits established; principle of parity prices for farm products recognized; surplus commodities made a blessing instead of a curse; farm and home foreclosures stopped and millions of others averted; soil conservation made a national practice; direct relief; public-works program; C. C. C.; T. V. A.; R. E. A.; National Youth Administration; public schools saved; national defense strengthened immeasurably; 20 ships laid down in 12 years of Republican coupon clipping; 115 ships laid down in 7 years of Democratic administration before the present program; kidnaping stamped out; reciprocal-trade agreements, making righteous tariff reductions, promoting world trade, and peace; social security begun and then strengthened; beginning of freight-rate justice; righteous principles of international law proclaimed and pleas for peace repeatedly and forcefully made; "fifth column" activities checked and counteracting laws passed; the greatest program for peace by national defense in all history begun.

We must be fair, however. There have been some Republican blessings:

The high protective tariff, which has robbed every worker on farm and in mine, forest, or factory.

Unjust, discriminatory freight rates.

The great depression.

But they say their glamour-boy has political "it" and "oomph," and that, though he is one of the heads of the power trust, he reduced the price of electricity. Those who would seduce must be seductive. The burglar who surrenders his stolen swag after his arrest, when the spotlight of the cop is fully upon him, is entitled to the same amount of credit as is the Power Trust for reducing rates after its arrest and exposure.

The father of Republicanism, Alexander Hamilton, frankly taught that Government should make the rich so rich that the rest of us could eat of the crumbs falling from their groaning tables. His philosophy still dominates the G. O. P.

The Democrats, tutored by Thomas Jefferson, have always believed in prosperity for all.

In recent history, the post-World War No. 1 period, we grew hard with Harding, cool with Coolidge, hungry with Hoover, but everything has grown rosy with Roosevelt. That hue suffuses the sky of our national life. A new day—a new, better era—is here. The American people know it, too, is the gift of the Democrats, and that only by continuing in power the party of performance can the future be assured.

After the Democratic victory in November the camp of the Republicans will be as dark and cold as was Elwood, Ind., when the natural gas gave out.

Mr. GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman HOBBS. This concludes part 1 of our program. And now as part 2 of tonight's American Forum of the Air, we present an informal panel discussion. Congressman DIRKSEN will open the discussion.

Congressman DIRKSEN. Mr. Granik, I should like to make an observation and probably ask a question of my friend and colleague, Mr. SMITH. He spoke some about the lack of experience of Mr. Willkie in political office. Well, it is rather singular that our Democratic brethren have been mentioning Attorney General Jackson for the Presidency, who has never held so much as the position of alderman on a city council. They have even mentioned Mr. Wallace of the Department of Agriculture, who has never held a political office. They have mentioned Mr. Farley, who has held a lot of party offices, but who has never held public political office.

I make another answer to that, and that is that Mr. Willkie, who has been the trustee and the steward of a property where more than $1,000,000,000 was invested, numbering hundreds of thousands of consumers and thousands of investors, has had so much experience in contacting the public, in seeking to interpret public desire, that he has a broad, fundamental foundation for public office that is unmatched anywhere, and finally let me say to my good friend, T. V. SMITH, with respect to his corporative experience, T. V., don't forget that in 1929 there was a shingle hanging out at 52 Wall Street, and the name on that shingle was Roosevelt and O'Connor, attorneys at law, and they were doing corporate business.

Congressman SMITH. It was such a little bit of a baby of a business that they were doing, though.

Congressman DIRKSEN. They were doing plenty of business up there, and, in addition, Franklin D. was the director of any number of corporations at the time.

Congressman SMITH. I thank you, DIRKSEN, for calling my attention to the lack of experience, as you say, in a good many Democratic aspirants, but I call attention in the first place to the fact that none of them have "blitzkrieged" the Democratic convention yet into nominating them for President. Second, every one you mention is a Cabinet officer, I believe, which constitutes a type of political experience that is a thousand miles nearer to the genius of our democratic form of government than any type of business experience can constitute. I don't deny that there is a good deal of virtue in the type of experience that Mr. Willkie has had and I have no doubt that he has turned it to the very best possible advantage for himself and for his stockholders, but the simple truth remains that anybody whose entire experience has been in one of the industrial aspects of American life, where there are plenty of other competitors, simply has not any type of political experience to justify a hope that he can be an effective President of the United States. Since man to man is so unjust, as the restaurant maxim goes, we never know just whom to trust. We have trusted many to our sorrow. Let them say today——

Congressman DIRKSEN. T. V., let me interrupt there a moment. Perhaps too much political experience is unwise, too. I am satisfied that Mr. Willkie, through his lack of experience, as you put it, certainly wouldn't undertake to pack the Supreme Court and send a "must" calendar up to Congress every time we have been in session the last 8 years.

Congressman SMITH. You wait until Mr. Willkie runs into some type of obstacle and you will see what he does. You are taking too much on trust about him.

Congressman DIRKSEN. You should see the warm smile that he has. His countenance is an open book.

Congressman SMITH. He has been used to having his way. You know this business yourself, DIRKSEN; you have spent years at this business, and you are extraordinarily effective at it. You know you weren't worth a continental the first day you were in Congress. I was not, and I am not worth much yet. You are extraordinarily able because you know this game, and nobody can learn it in a few days.

Congressman DIRKSEN. He has had contact with the public, and that has been his business for a great many years.

Congressman CRAWFORD. I should like to ask our friend and colleague, Mr. SMITH, to expound just a little bit on the two thoughts he gave us, the first with reference to the acceptable doctrines, which the administration has given us in the last few years. In the first place, as I recall, the voters at the last election in November 1938 sent about 75 or 80 new House Members down here on the Republican side, which would indicate to me that the doctrines which were being followed were not quite so acceptable.

Another point is with reference to Mr. Willkie's corporate experience. If I have not misled myself the last few weeks, it appears that this Nation is in the middle of a bad fix and needs some very serious fixing up from the standpoint of national defense, and I have also led myself to believe that the President is now calling upon the corporate enterprises of this country to build that national defense in the form of tanks, antiaircraft guns, ships, and so forth and so on. Where will we be if we politicians keep palavering around and wind up within 5 or 10 years from now with having just played politics for 8 or 10 more years and not any national defense?

Would you give us just a little more light about those two points, about acceptable doctrines and corporate experience?

Congressman SMITH. The trouble is, Mr. CRAWFORD, that all the crying around about politics that has been done has been done by the new Republicans, who don't know any better. They ball up the machinery of Congress. It is one thing, however, to have new Members of Congress where you always have enough old Members to season them and break them in, as we have broken these new Republicans in, until they are now becoming almost responsible devotees of our defense program, and it is another thing to put a man in the single office of the United States where there is no competitor, but where he must deal with equals, and where all of his experience has been the experience of being able to have his way, to order things done—that is a very serious matter, in my opinion.

Congressman CRAWFORD. Of course, this is the first time I have known the Democrats to admit that the new Republicans we have—with the Democrats having over two-thirds majority in both the House and Senate—have gummed up the works and blocked the program and prevented the Democrats from having their way. That certainly is news to me.

Congressman SMITH. I am talking about playing politics. We have been able to keep you in line and have been successful in getting the program along.

Mr. Wendell Willkie is a Roosevelt Democrat when it comes to that defense question.

Congressman DIRKSEN. I would like to point out, as a member of the House Appropriations Committee, that I made an examination of that matter not so long ago. I found that within the 8 years we gave within $37,000,000 of what was asked for through the Budget Bureau. It was either the President or the Budget Bureau and not the Congress that fell down. With respect to the appropriations for defense, we gave them all except $37,000,000 out of $3,000,000,000, and if our national-defense program is still "on order," T. V., the blame rests in the White House—not on the Hill. That is all before the present defense program.

Congressman HOBBS. I can't refrain from asking Mr. DIRKSEN to read Senator BYRNES' speech on that subject of national defense, and I am sure that his remarks indicate that he has not.

The question that I would like to ask him is, If he thinks there is any causal connection between the charging by the Power Trust in some instances as high as 15 cents for electricity which cost only 2 mills?

Congressman DIRKSEN. Why, SAM, I would like say that the answer to that is right here before me. I brought along a copy of the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee of the House with respect to that bill to give Commonwealth & Southern $76,000,000 for their properties, taking over those in Alabama and Tennessee, and here is the chief engineer of the T. V. A. testifying, mind you, that they gave Commonwealth & Southern an extra $9,000,000 to get them out of business. What a fine kettle of fish in the country when Uncle Sam steps in, opens up the Treasury, and says, "Here is an extra $9,000,000; we want you out of business because we don't want to compete with you. It will be too destructive, the rates will go down even more, consumption will go up, and Uncle Sam will be holding the bag." There is the whole record of the business before the House committee, which is the answer to the question as to how much has been charged.

As a matter of fact, power rates have gone down by half in your area and consumption has gone up by more than 100 percent. That is the answer. When toasters and curling irons are brought to obscure people, there is Willkie's answer, and he can stand on his own feet and announce it to all the world.

Congressman HOBBS. But that just shows how wrong you are when you quote from the record. I understood you to say that the T. V. A. has been cruel to Wendell Willkie and not——

Congressman DIRKSEN (interposing). It put him out of business in your State, as a matter of fact.

Congressman HOBBS. And yet we gave him $9,000,000 more than he was entitled to.

Congressman DIRKSEN. You know and any enterprise knows full well that you can't compete with this huge Juggernaut known as the United States Government, which has a bonded-debt limit up to $49,000,000,000 at the present time. No private enterprise in the country can stand up against that kind of unfairness.

Congressman HOBBS. And yet in Alabama there are instances where the rates charged by Mr. Willkie were as high as 15 cents for the unit that cost him 2 mills. Seventy-five times the cost of production is a pretty good profit, and that may be some answer to the query: Why did Government compete? The answer is: To serve the people and to reduce rates to where they were fair, so that the people could use electricity and to lighten the burdens of housewives.

Congressman SMITH. You don't deny, do you, that the T. V. A. has had a good deal of causal influence in the bringing down of electric rates?

Congressman DIRKSEN. I don't believe it has had one iota of influence out in our country. The T. V. A. power doesn't get up to Illinois.

Congressman SMITH. I am not talking about Illinois. I am talking about the T. V. A. region.

Congressman DIRKSEN. It has probably had some effect down there, no doubt. If it hasn't, then, of course, we have $500,000,000 invested in the Tennessee Valley for which the taxpayers of 48 States of the Union paid and the taxpayers of only 2 States really derived the benefit. Is that fair?

Congressman SMITH. Well, it is terribly important to keep that very clear here, because this principle of governmental intervention into what the businessmen call business is really the issue from which nearly all the Republicans who have nominated Willkie hope for relief.

Congressman HOBBS. I would just like to ask if there isn't such a thing as indirect action? In other words, if the T. V. A. yardstick, which may or may not be accurate and fair, hasn't saved the power consumers all over the Nation over $500,000,000 a year in power and light bills?

Congressman CRAWFORD. I should like to ask Mr. HOBBS, of Alabama, this question: He referred to the way the Republicans were now going to build a great army of employees in order to win this election. I wonder if my friend from Alabama overlooks the fact that this party of pillage, the Democratic Party, has added about 450,000 employees to the Government's pay rolls in the last few years at the cost of the taxpayers; while if Mr. Willkie builds up a group such as our friend from Alabama refers to, it will be paid for out of the private pockets of the people voluntarily. Now, wherein do you get mixed up as to the party of pillage? Will you explain to us why the Democrats have had to add these 450,000 people to the pay roll? Incidentally, that 1,000,000 now on the Federal pay roll does not include some 3,500,000 more which are on the pay roll in the form of relief, and I would like to see all of these people get back on private pay rolls. I am sick and tired of seeing them depend on public pay rolls all the time.

Congressman HOBBS. I will be more than happy to answer the gentleman's question. The reason that most people are on the public pay roll is to correct the abuses and mistakes made by your Republican administrations or, rather, misadministrations, in the 12 years of your coupon clipping. You led them into free soup lines and bread lines and didn't give them anything to do. We have restored the morale of the masses by giving them work relief.

Congressman CRAWFORD. You have spent 8 years trying to build back what you claim was torn down in about 3 years. About how many years will your party want to really put this thing in good shape?

Congressman HOBBS. Just as long as a grateful people will recognize that their desires are being answered by the party of the people.

Congressman DIRKSEN. I was going to say to Sam, with respect to that observation and also with respect to his earlier observation about the progress that has been made in the last 8 years, that when it started out there were about 11,000,000 people out of work; they have run the national debt from $21,000,000,000 to $45,000,000,000 and then asked Congress for an additional $4,000,000,000 to their $45,000,000,000, and the reduction in unemployment has been 1,000,000 at the very outside. So, while there is a staggering burden of debt in the country today, we still have at least 10,000,000 people out of work, and they take comfort in the fact that they have done some good. It is like the old wheeze I used to tell about pulling a man three-quarters of the way out of the well. When he says, "Pull me out of here," you say, "Aren't you better off than when you were at the bottom?" That is the kind of comfort they give you in the country today.

Congressman HOBBS. Yes; but there was just 1 man in the well, and there were 11,000,000 in this hole.

Congressman DIRKSEN. And they are still there.

Congressman HOBBS. Ask the 1,000,000 or the 3,000,000 that I say have been saved.

Congressman SMITH. After all, DIRKSEN, we have a very real problem here, as you know. We haven't been too successful in it. I don't want to put on any false front, but so far as the Republican platform is concerned—which you have ignored—and so far as Mr. Wendell Willkie's program—which you don't know—is concerned, not one single subsidy to anybody of the Federal Government in the Democratic Party is going to be stopped under the Republican administration if they win in 1940. You simply are talking thin air about the better correction of these difficulties and the more complete solution of these problems under Mr. Willkie, aren't you?

Congressman DIRKSEN. Let's see what the problem is. If you asked the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission here in Washington, he would tell you that the amount of money that is going into new corporate financings at the present time is a mere drop in the bucket compared to what it was in 1929, in spite of the fact that there is more money on deposit in the banks of the country today than at any other time in the history of the country. Until that money goes to work, until idle dollars join in holy wedlock with idle hands, we are not going to find the solution to that problem, and it becomes necessary to let the administration take its clammy hands off of investment in order to get this country started, and that is the spark that Wendell Willkie will supply.

Congressman SMITH. Do you know that Wendell Willkie is the Pied Piper that will do it, for I beg you to remember that during the so-called honeymoon Roosevelt was more trusted by American big business than any other President that we have had perhaps in 2 decades.

Congressman DIRKSEN. I admit that was despair speaking in 1933, and we have been very patient and very tolerant about it. I have gone along with more than one-half of the New Deal measures that have been brought to Congress in the last 8 years. Now we take a survey, and what is the result? Business is stagnant today; after 8 years the debt is 'way up; the unemployed are still there, and farm prices are so inadequate that the spectral hands of foreclosure are still reaching down and taking farms away from the farmers in this country.

Congressman CRAWFORD. Dirksen, don't you know that that is the live nation that can't be resurrected that our friend, T. V., was speaking about a while ago?

Congressman DIRKSEN. It can be resurrected.

Congressman SMITH. But don't you see that when he pays all the subsidies that we have been paying and everything else—and you don't know anything to the contrary—you are going to have clammier hands than ever, because they will be corporative, if not corpulent, hands.

Congressman DIRKSEN. That is no answer to the real problem, and I have pointed out the real problem, and that is to get idle dollars into enterprise.

Congressman HOBBS. I just want to say it amuses me to hear these Republicans talk. They are fine fellows personally, and, having been raised that way, they can't see that they are wrong. Here is what the Republican platform says, that is, as nearly as you will find any clear statement in it: "We will do everything that you inaugurated and are now doing. We will do it better, and under us it wouldn't cost anything."

Congressman DIRKSEN. Sam, let me say that there is one thing, of course, we aren't going to follow you in. We aren't going to follow that course that is likely to put this country into a foreign war. We very specifically state that in the platform.

Congressman SMITH. The Democratic Party certainly is the peace party, so far as peace is possible through either preparedness in Europe or moral preparedness in South America. Wait until you see the Democratic Party's platform, if you are going to trust promises. We have kept the country out of war.

Congressman DIRKSEN. Don't you know you never used your 1932 or your 1936 platforms?

Congressman CRAWFORD. I would just like to point out that, in my opinion, our domestic situation is not in order. This is not a live Nation at the present time. In capital investment it is profoundly missing. This must be corrected if labor is to be increased, costs reduced, and goods improved, so that we may get these so-called South American markets we are talking about. A high standard of living is never created by legislation, but it comes from coordinated research, engineering, management, capital, and labor; and, in my opinion, "Wen" Willkie will put those important forces into operation.

Congressman HOBBS. I just want to say that, if my recollection serves me correctly, the majority of the seven wars that have been fought by this Nation have been under Republican administrations but I feel perfectly sure that both great parties are committed to peace, and that there will be no intervention in foreign wars.

Two representatives were passing the White House the other day as Mr. Roosevelt rolled down the drive. One of them threw a thumb toward the White House—this was before the Philadelphia convention—and said, "Dewey or Taft?" The other one, wiser and older and more experienced, said, "Big boy, you have got your wires crossed; that isn't the question. The question is, 'Do he or don't he?'"

That is still the question, only it is now transposed to "Will he or won't he?"

Dr. MAURICE PROTAS. I see by the papers that Senator WHEELER might head a third party. My question is, Mr. Granik, What effect would a coalition of Roosevelt and WHEELER have on the G. O. P.?

Mr. GRANIK. Congressman SMITH?

Congressman SMITH. That is so improbable. I especially dislike to prophesy on things that are improbable.

Congressman CRAWFORD. I don't mind making an observation on that. So far as I am personally concerned, I would be delighted to have President Roosevelt and Mr. WHEELER on the Democratic ticket.

Mr. GRANIK. Any further comment, Mr. HOBBS?

Congressman HOBBS. None at all, except to say that I think that is the business of the Democratic Convention and not of my very dear friend, FRED CRAWFORD; but we welcome his endorsement of any Democratic ticket.

Congressman DIRKSEN. I want to make one observation with respect to a question raised by Mr. HOBBS a while ago about the so-called T. V. A. yardstick. The public generally doesn't know that in administering the hundreds of millions that we invested in T. V. A. they developed a very synthetic, artificial, and almost fantastic formula. That is to say, they allocated about 30 percent of the money to power, the rest to flood control and navigation, and then they predicated rates on that 30 percent. You show me a utility in this country or any other country that can stay in business competition with the Federal Government where only 30 percent of its investment is made the basis for rate making. Then they talk about adopting this synthetic, chimerical, and silly yardstick. It just can't be adapted to American enterprise and industry today.

Congressman HOBBS. Show me a public utility that has ever benefited the public by flood control or improved navigation facilities. The answer to that, the reason we charged those amounts to those two great beneficent services, is that we delivered the goods. That is why.

Congressman DIRKSEN. I would like to see somebody show me the kind of navigation they are going to have on the Tennessee River.

Congressman HOBBS. You are going to have a 9-foot channel to Paducah, Ky.

Congressman DIRKSEN. Yes; and you are going to have a lake so wide that anything which is less than an ocean-going vessel will founder.

Congressman HOBBS. Anything might founder that is run by the Republicans. I wouldn't vouch for that.

Congressman SMITH. After all, we do have a magnificent plant down there, DIRKSEN, and, after all, the electric rates have been coming down more rapidly under this administration under private management than the country had any right to expect and certainly ever experienced before. That speaks very eloquently for it.

Congressman DIRKSEN. Oh, does it? What was the bill we had the other day to reimburse the people in Tennessee and Alabama for the taxes that were lost that were heretofore paid by private utilities? They came to Congress and said, "We have lost these taxes in our cities, counties, and school districts. Now let's dip into the Federal Treasury and let the people in the other States of the Union pay the tax bill for the displacement of taxes on public utilities."

Congressman HOBBS. Of course, the distinguished gentleman knows that that is in the 12 percent which was added to the rates charged by T. V. A. for that purpose, because they realize that it was just. They, being under a Democratic administration, think that it is wrong to steal.

Congressman DIRKSEN. The answer to that is that in 1933, when they passed the bill, I heard them stand in the Well of the House of Representatives and say 5 percent was enough, and we gave it to them.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen. You have been listening to the American Forum of the Air presenting a discussion on What Are the Chances of the G. O. P. Ticket? And now for a final word from Mr. McCormick.

Presidential Votes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH McKELLAR
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLES BY HON. EDWARD R. BURKE, OF NEBRASKA, AND HON KENNETH McKELLAR, OF TENNESSEE

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, several days ago there were published in the Chicago Herald-American articles by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] and myself concerning a political matter. I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY I'LL VOTE FOR WILLKIE

(By EDWARD R. BURKE, Democratic Senator from Nebraska—written expressly for the Chicago Herald-American)

WASHINGTON, July 31.—Without question, we are on the threshold of one of the most interesting, one of the most bitterly contested, one of the most significant Presidential campaigns in our entire history. There are to be presented conflicting views on domestic policy and on foreign relations.

To my mind, there is involved in this election a principle of such vital importance that the decision made next November will be the turning point which will settle once for all the kind of government which will prevail in the United States for generations to come.

The question to which I refer is not merely whether we shall permit a Chief Executive to continue himself in office for a third term.

Such a course itself has been declared by both Houses of Congress, and by the ablest and most far-seeing of our statesmen, to be "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

But the question before the country now is not simply whether we shall permit a third term, contrary to the precedent established by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson, and strongly upheld in principle by Cleveland, Bryan, Taft, and many of our greatest statesmen. The issue which will be settled this year is whether there shall be any limitation on the tenure of office of President.

If Roosevelt is reelected in November and the illusion of indispensability of one man is established—if the electorate decides that among the 130,000,000 of our citizens there is only one man to whom we can safely turn to guide the ship of state—then, indeed, we will have done much more than decide that in the present emergency we are willing to continue Roosevelt for 4 years more.

Is there anyone so simple-minded as to believe that in 1944 the world will not be faced with the same or another emergency that will require that this one indispensable man shall be continued on indefinitely?

Before you consent to tear down the tradition which has required our Chief Executive to face the necessity of surrendering his power at the end of a limited term, let there be present in your mind this thought, that the one who is now asking you to break this sacred tradition is the same man who 3 short years ago sought with all the power of his great office to apply force to the judiciary, to destroy the independence of our courts, to violate the spirit and in fact the constitutional requirement for the separation of the powers of the Government into three independent branches.

It may be that some Presidents we have had could have served for three terms or more without serious injury to our form of government. It may be that in other times, more normal, this tradition of limited tenure was not so vital.

But in view of world trends in 1940, and particularly in consideration of certain qualities of the present occupant of the office of Chief Executive, the continuance of this rule that requires the surrender of authority on a fixed day becomes of the utmost importance.

As the only practical means of accomplishing the defeat of the forces that would undermine this fundamental safeguard of American liberty, I shall work and vote for the election of Wendell Willkie as President.

WHY I'LL VOTE FOR ROOSEVELT

(By KENNETH MCKELLAR, Democratic Senator from Tennessee—written expressly for the Chicago Herald-American)

WASHINGTON, July 31.—I have been asked by your paper to give my reasons why I am supporting President Roosevelt for reelection in November. My reasons follow:

I believe that in this world war crisis, with war raging in Europe, Asia, Africa, and on the high seas, President Roosevelt, with his 8 years' experience, is the best equipped and most experienced man in our country to direct our Government in the best interests of our people.

I believe that because of President Roosevelt's forthright and vigorous way of dealing with our foreign situation our chances of peace will be better, and there will be less disposition in the mind of any foreign dictator to attack us, whatever may be the result of the war in Europe, Asia, or elsewhere.

I believe our first duty in this crisis is to prepare our country for any emergency. President Roosevelt has shown, by his messages to the Congress on the subject of preparedness, that he is fully and completely alive to the dangers which confront us, that he has already begun preparedness on a mammoth scale, and that he intends, with congressional approval, to continue to prepare this country so that no other nation will dare attack us.

I believe that few Presidents in our history, perhaps none, would have taken the prompt, vigorous, and almost unlimited steps which President Roosevelt has already taken to preserve peace and prevent attack.

It must be remembered that President Roosvelt more than a year ago warned us of impending danger from without and urged the Congress immediately to change our neutrality laws the better to preserve peace; and he has also warned us to increase our Army and Navy to prepare us for any eventuality.

It must also be remembered that President Roosevelt has uniformly been an advocate of peace. Many times he has urged foreign countries not to invade other countries, not to attempt to govern by force, not to go to war. He has used every effort to keep peace among our foreign neighbors and to keep peace at home.

Again, I am for President Roosevelt because I approve of his domestic policies. When he took office our country was in economic ruin. He has restored it to a remarkable degree. He has taken the lead in restoring the agricultural conditions of the country, and has improved the condition of the farmer as no other President ever did.

I am for him because he has done more to improve the condition of the men who labor with their hands than any other President who has ever sat in the White House. He has done more for the "forgotten man" than any other President ever did.

I am for him because he has done more to restore the Nation's business, especially a sound system of banking, than any other leader we ever had—a banking system in which every depositor in a bank is more secure, and can get his money whenever he checks against it.

President Roosevelt has done more for social security, more to alleviate the necessities of old age, of children, of the sick, and all others in distress, and has done more for human charity, than any other President we have had.

I am for President Roosevelt because during his administration, for the most part, we have been prosperous and happy, and have had perfect peace at home, and our government and people are respected, esteemed, and looked up to abroad.

President Roosevelt has aided in building up and restoring our entire country, its roads, its schoolhouses, its public buildings, its waterways, its airways, its transportation system, including better urban and rural electrification, and has aided wonderfully in making our country a better place in which to live.

I am supporting President Roosevelt because of his large humanitarianism, and his sustained interest in the great masses of the people.

I am supporting him because his opponent is an outstanding representative of class and special privilege, and a lifelong advocate of taxing by way of utility rates all the people for the special benefit of the few he represents.

I am supporting President Roosevelt because his opponent has never had any open experience with any legislative, executive, judicial, or other governmental activity, and without some such experience it would be a miracle if he made a good President of the United States.

Finally, we all know how private power companies have been established in this country. Men like Mr. Willkie have come to a [illegible] town and secured a contract from the local government to distribute light and power there for a long term of years. They then organized a corporation which promptly issued bonds, the amount and proceeds of which would build the plant and pay all preliminary expenses. At the same time they would issue common stock, usually in double the amount of the bonds, giving the bond buyers a part of such watered stock for furnishing the money, and paying the remainder of the watered stock to themselves as a bonus, the company in all cases getting no money value for the common stock. By their contract they fixed such enormous rates to be charged the users of electricity as would pay all running expenses, interest, and sinking-fund charges, and still have ample and sufficient money to pay large dividends upon the watered stock. They would then form holding companies and again pyramid this watered stock, on which the people were required to pay unconscionable dividends. It is the most outstanding and unconscionable system of private exploitation of the people ever known in the world. Mr. Willkie for many years has been part and parcel of this exploiting scheme, and the president of one of its leading organizations. I concede that Mr. Willkie in this business has been a past grand master. His contract with the Tennessee Valley Authority, in which he sold his Tennessee companies to that Authority, shows that he is able, that he serves the watered-stock holders of his companies as perhaps no other man ever did. This has been his life work. I do not believe that this business has fitted him to be President of the United States. I do not believe the American people want a watered-stock salesman for their President.

The Coal Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE RETAIL COALMAN

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, another governmental bureau in this present administration, and I refer to the Bituminous Coal Commission, is causing a very serious protestation from not only the coal dealers and from coal operators but most consumers of coal throughout our Nation. Before imposing further restrictions on the coal industry we should most seriously consider the harm that is going to entail among the consumers of coal.

Mr. B. C. Forbes, under date of July 16, 1940, in the New York Journal-American in his article in regard to Britain's experience in girding for warfare, made the following statement:

The coal business has been demoralized by state control. Coal was rationed, although there is plenty of it. Few today believe in the nationalization of the coal business.

One fact that has been strongly impressed upon the minds of British businessmen is the need for strong, watchful trade associations, to protect trades and industries from harmful regulations.

Also, I submit a very interesting article in the June issue of the Retail Coalman, on the subject A Decision Which Is Wholly Unmoral.

The article follows:

[From the Retail Coalman of June 1940]

A DECISION WHICH IS WHOLLY UNMORAL—THE FINDING OF THE SUPREME COURT UPHOLDS THE GOVERNMENT AND IGNORES PUBLIC WELFARE

It is unfortunate that a man who occupies the exalted position of Mr. Justice Douglas should stoop to two methods which dictated the tenor of the decision of the United States Supreme Court on the constitutionality of the Coal Act of 1937. Specifically, he rested an important part of the ruling upon a statement which is not true. That statement was:

"For a generation there have been various manifestations of incessant demand for Federal intervention in the coal industry."

Bluntly stated, that is not true. It is true that the Congress has had that subject before it. But who were the proponents? It was suggested in 1917 by the Federal Trade Commission, which wanted, itself, to be the master of coal. At other intervals it was proposed by the bureau in the Department of the Interior which wanted to be, and is now and finally, the regulatory body. It was proposed by Senators Frelinghuysen and Calder, who represented coal-consuming States, because they wanted to be reelected to office. It was, at times, concurred in by the miners' union, which hoped thereby to gain a final mastery of the southern field, which it has won since by means of this regulation.

There has never been a single resolution by any body of consumers saying that they were willing to pay the higher prices involved if coal were bailed by the Government out of an unprofitable routine. Until minimum prices were proposed, no single body of investors in coal ever signified any interest in the subject. So it is not true, as Mr. Justice Douglas said, that there has been other than a self-serving demand for Federal intervention in coal. It is unfortunate that he should have said otherwise.

Mr. Justice Douglas said, in substance, that the wisdom of the legislation was for the Congress to decide; not the courts. The Supreme Court never decided any case in that way until it began to save its hide by abdicating part of the judicial function which, theretofore, the same Court had exercised through a century. It was an act of softness—of cowardice, if you please—when the Court began to vote its political opinions rather than the principles of law and justice.

Coal is an industry which, while keeping the wheels of industry turning over, produces 200,000 tons per hour. It used to produce 250,000 per hour. Bituminous has suffered that loss of 50,000 tons per hour because it has priced itself out of its market. It was forced to do that—and to undertake mechanization—because its costs dictated its prices. Its costs, in turn, were dictated by the stranglehold of labor on the industry. Labor got that stranglehold—and has the highest wages in all industry—due to Federal intervention in behalf of the union.

There is not on record a single protest by the industry or by the consumer raising the slightest objection to the ending of turmoil and strife within the coal industry. There has been no protest against avoiding waste of this natural resource. There has been no protest against the ending of murderous cutthroat competition or the adoption of fair-trade practices. Coal has been abundantly on record in favor of all of them.

We come, then, to the real point at issue. The coal producer and retailer have wanted to reduce prices in keeping with improved methods. They advocated that policy out of consideration for the consumers. That is public welfare raised to the *n*th power.

What they have objected to—and still do—is to raising costs which will force higher prices—against good public policy. The iniquity of the present set-up is that it gives the Department of the Interior control over costs. This will be enhanced, manyfold, if the Congress shall enact the mine-inspection law. Costs—dictated costs—are then made the basis of minimum prices. The unmorality of the statute is this marriage of costs and prices which has ruined every industry regulated under the same theory. That question runs to the wisdom of the statute. That question is ignored by the Supreme Court—it refused to consider it. This means that the Supreme Court holds it is good law if an administration wants it and can force it through the Congress. That is politics, not justice.

Justified Suspicions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I wish to include an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune. This editorial has to do with disclosures made by me earlier in today's session.

[From New York Herald Tribune of August 5, 1940]

JUSTIFIED SUSPICIONS

One remembers that President Roosevelt asked, and on June 27 got, from Congress permission to spend the entire W. P. A. appropriation for the current fiscal year within 8 months from July 1 at his discretion. We mention this for whatever bearing it may have on the statement of Representative SHAFER of Michigan that there has been a "startling increase in the printing of blank relief checks and food stamps by the Bureau of Engraving," presumably for distribution in key States in the course of the President's campaign for a third term.

"I am fully aware," says Mr. SHAFER, "of the serious nature of the implications contained in my statement." He relies, however, on the past performance of the administration to justify them and cites the recurring phenomenon in election years of a rise in relief rolls between June and November against an upturn in business and increase in private employment. He points to the reverse phenomenon in nonelection years, namely, a reduction of these rolls despite a decline in business and in private employment.

We are not prepared to vouch for the complete accuracy of his percentages, but a glance at the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1939 supports his general thesis. Thus one finds that in 1936 persons employed on W. P. A. projects decreased in number from 3,019,000 in February to 2,245,000 in July, when an upturn started, reaching its peak of 2,546,000 in October, and this notwithstanding an improvement of business that fall and a reduction of unemployment for the year which Mr. SHAFER estimates at 13 percent. After election the rolls fell off, reaching a low for the year of 2,243,000 in December.

In 1937, a nonelection year, on the other hand, the relief rolls continued to decline through September, showing a slight increase in October and November and a jump in December. Yet 1937 marked the collapse of the second Roosevelt recovery. "In 1937," according to Mr. SHAFER of Michigan, "the Federal relief rolls showed a decline of 16.9 percent from June through October, although the index of production declined 10.5 percent in that period."

Most of us are familiar with the padding of the relief rolls in advance of the elections in 1938. They reached an all-time high of 3,239,000 in November of that year in face of a rise of private employment. Then again, as in 1936, they began dropping in December. Thanks in part to the disgust of Congress with the use of W. P. A. votes in the campaign of 1938, the drop continued in 1939. Mr. SHAFER of Michigan says it increased 25.5 percent for the months preceding the usual election date which held no interest for the Federal administration.

Against such a background Mr. SHAFER of Michigan need not apologize for his suspicions. There is the record; there are the blank checks; there is the President's authority, at his request, to spend the money allotted to the W. P. A. in the next 7 months, if he chooses, and, perhaps not an insignificant item, there is Harry Hopkins more or less in charge of the third-term effort. Meanwhile a war boom of unexampled proportions has set in. Soon, with $10,000,000,000 earmarked for national defense, it will be absorbing idle or relief workers by the tens of thousands daily. Is it possible that the President, under these circumstances, is really contemplating a repetition of his Santa Claus strategy of 1936 and 1938?

American Legion on a Program of Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS H. CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the American Legion, Department of South Dakota, at its annual convention in Watertown, S. Dak., July 30, 1940:

Whereas it has been the policy of the American Legion from its first inception to stand behind a universal draft and conscription plan that would not only affect the manpower of our Nation but factories, shops, and every facility having a military bearing; and

Whereas after 20 years the Nation is coming into line with the American Legion's campaign for adequate national defense, and the Legion faces a new challenge—that of being a balance wheel to help guarantee that the new national enthusiasm does not carry the nation at a higher speed than conditions justify and wind up in inefficiency, hysteria, and waste. The task of calming hysteria rests particularly upon the shoulders of the Legion in the Middle West, free as it is of the war talk and bogey man heralded on both coasts and even in the National Capital: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, Department of South Dakota, urges that the Legion continue spreading to all Americans the facts concerning the menace of "fifth columnists" and continue directing all reports of subversive activity through proper channels to the authorities equipped and authorized by law to handle such activities;

That there be kept in mind the long-time Legion program of calling equally upon capital, industry, and labor for their part in any building up of national defense, and that there be no rush to build up vast armies unequipped—armies which we are unprepared to train;

That any effort toward Nation-wide conscription or mass draft of manpower be approached most carefully and not undertaken until all other avenues have been exhausted, and until there has been an earnest and well-built-up call for volunteers. The response to the call for pilots to train under C. A. A. indicates that young men are willing to go, and their voluntary enlistment will of necessity mean less disruption in industry and less hysteria and war fear in the land than will conscription;

That the discipline of the Civilian Conservation Corps be tightened to a degree that any program set up by Government can be definitely carried out, and that C. C. C. enrollees be given training in truck transport and repair and in those other noncombatant services which are most important and slowest to develop in time of emergency;

That the American Legion in South Dakota continue its program of service to the community and that its membership make clear its readiness to serve in any formal or casual defense program that may be set up; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be promptly forwarded to our United States Senators and Representatives in Washington, D. C.

What Price Freedom?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

EXTRACT FROM THE VERMONT HOUSE JOURNAL, SPECIAL SESSION, JULY 24, 1940

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I include an extract from the Vermont House Journal of the special session of the Vermont Legislature of date July 24, 1940:

CONGRESSMAN CHARLES A. PLUMLEY INTRODUCED

The Honorable CHARLES A. PLUMLEY, Congressman at large from Vermont, appearing within the lobby of the house, was introduced by the speaker and thereupon delivered an address, which, upon motion of Mr. Bloomer, of West Rutland, was ordered printed in the journal and is as follows:

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, they tell me that a city mail carrier's idea of a vacation is to take a 10-mile walk. Apparently some of you think that in this recess of the Congress I should take a similar type of vacation, and that is why you have invited me to address you.

I would like to take advantage of this occasion and to speak to you as one who for a good many years was one of the clerks and later the speaker of this body. I would like publicly to commend your clerk, Mr. Harold Arthur, for the very valuable and comprehensive work accomplished by him in his undertaking to codify the precedents of the Vermont House of Representatives and to index the same. It was a tremendous job, as no one knows better than I do. Some 30 years ago the Honorable Homer L. Skeels, then secretary of the senate, and I, undertook to do the very thing which your clerk, Arthur, has carried to such successful completion.

The Vermont Legislature is traditionally the finest parliamentary body in this country if not in the world, and that is by reason of the fact that you so strictly and so closely follow the rules which you have prescribed. Through the years certain precedents have been established in modification of general rules or in amplification of the same. Today, by virtue of the public interests and his desire to serve as manifested by this work, you have before you an outstanding codification which will stand for all time, not only as a monument to you but to the young man who gave his time and effort to spread the same on your records.

Confidentially, I am going to talk to you for a few minutes and I am not at a loss for what to say, because I am going to make you the speech which I had prepared to deliver at the Legion convention next Friday. I will have to go home after adjournment today and prepare another speech for the Legion convention.

So I say to you, as he looked out across the valleys toward the mountain tops and into the faces of the men and women of his native State, that most distinguished son of Vermont, the former President, Calvin Coolidge, at Bennington, took occasion to say:

"If the spirit of liberty should vanish in other parts of the Union and support of our institutions should languish, it could all be replenished from the generous store held by the people of this brave little State of Vermont."

No man ever made a statement more true or one more justly or more genuinely deserved, but let me tell you, fellow Vermonters, that liberty comes alone and lives alone when the hard-won rights of men are held inalienable, where governments themselves may not infringe, where governments are indeed but the mechanisms to protect and sustain these liberties from encroachment. It was this for which our fathers died; it was this heritage they gave to us. It was not the provision with regard to interstate commerce or the determination of weights and measures or coinage, for which the Constitution was derived—it was the guaranties that men possessed fundamental liberties apart from the state, that they were not the pawns but masters of the state. We know that we cannot extend the mastery of governments over the daily life of a people without somewhere making it master of peoples' souls. Government conduct of business might give us maximum efficiency, but it would be purchased at the cost of freedom.

The appetite for power grows with every opportunity to assume it, and power over the rights of men leads to arrogance, then despotism, then liberty dies. Everywhere democracy is on the defensive. Everywhere free enterprise is in chains. The world no longer moves forward on the wings of freedom.

Men in high places challenge the validity of the principles upon which we have built our American civilization. Governmental policies are steadily undermining the foundations of our political and economic structures.

It is time for the American people to pause and take stock; to get back to fundamentals; to realize there is no magic cure for their troubles and that they have reached the point where they must decide whether to fight it out within the framework of the American constitutional system and in accordance with well-established American social and economic principles or to throw over 150 years of experience, scuttle our American institutions, and try their luck with some form of European collectivism.

The obligation of our generation is to protect and to preserve and to pass on to our children the heritage of liberty that was entrusted to us.

That is the hope which inspires us. It is the beginning of self-government. It is the throne of our highest ideals. It is the center of the energy that drives us on to accomplishment.

So today let us thank God that our lot is cast on this continent; here are our frontiers; here is found our opportunity to make the finest type of civilization the world has ever known, provided you and I and those who come after us only have the intelligence to conserve the opportunity that is ours and the necessary courage to defend and to preserve it. If we do not have both, we do not deserve the great good fortune that is ours to have and to hold.

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OSCAR YOUNGDAHL
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MINNEAPOLIS TIMES-TRIBUNE

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks to include an editorial from the Minneapolis Times-Tribune of July 30.

CONSCRIPTION

No one, with the possible exception of professional soldiers, is in favor of compulsory military training or conscription. In and of itself, nothing can be said for it that cannot with equal truth be said for many other forms of totalitarianism. It is a surrender of personal liberty on a rather large scale, and its social and economic effects will be disagreeable and costly. No one is in favor of the expenditure of billions of taxpayers' money, with the consequent lowering of our level of living, in order to build another navy; no one is in favor of spending more billions to underwrite the export surpluses of Mexico, Canada, Central America, and South America. Each and every one of these proposals, if put into effect, will take something desirable out of our lives. Democracy, as we know it and love it, will be diminished, with the dread possibility that eventually it may be extinguished.

The only debatable issue is, Are any or all of these proposals necessary?

If the required necessity exists, there is no question as to the abstract qualities, virtues, or faults of the proposals any more than there is to the abstract quality of relief expenditures. Anyone can make a point of the economic absurdity of paying farmers not to produce food, but no one can deny the existing sociological necessity for doing so. It may be pointed out that the morale and the initiative of many of the recipients of the various forms of relief are weakened, but no alternative to these payments is forthcoming. Necessity has made us depart from policies once considered immutable, and necessity may cause us to resort to compulsory military training.

In the matter of military defense we are, for the time being, confronted with possibilities rather than actualities, such as unemployment, food surpluses, etc. We are considering what may happen, rather than what has happened, and thus find ourselves in the field of speculation which has no other boundaries than human imagination. One may believe that as soon as Hitler has finished with England he will launch a devastating attack on our shores to continue his conquest around the globe, and yet another be convinced that an ocean 100 times the width of the English Channel makes the possibility of an attack negligible. Between these extremes there is ample room for differences of opinion as to the necessity for conscription.

It will be generally admitted that in the present state of the world, the United States must take some defensive precautions. If we are going to take upon ourselves the military and economic defense of this hemisphere from pole to pole, a great many unwilling men and a great many unwilling dollars will be required, and a very close approximation to totalitarianism will be necessary.

What we need today, more than anything else, is a calm, dispassionate appraisal of probabilities, not possibilities, to determine just what insurance we should take out. The present haste to impose conscription on the youth of the country suggests panic and hysteria. The unpredictable future may make conscription necessary, or even inevitable, but there is not discernible, in the present situation, any justification for overnight action.

To plan an adequate Navy that will come into existence years hence is one thing; to start immediately to conscript youth for a war that may never come to our shores, is another and much more serious matter.

Hands Off the Americas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1940

ARTICLE BY JESSE S. COTTRELL

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a very splendid feature written by Jesse S. Cottrell. Mr. Cottrell was Minister to Bolivia from 1921 to 1927 and is therefore personally acquainted with the South American situation. He is now an able and popular Washington correspondent. His analysis of the work of the administration through the great Secretary of State is well worth reading.

The article is as follows:

HANDS OFF THE AMERICAS

(By Jesse S. Cottrell, United States Minister to Bolivia, 1921 to 1927, during the Harding and Coolidge administrations)

The eyes of the diverse and varied political interests of the Western Hemisphere are today centered on the Pan American Conference that begins in Habana July 20.

This is why the Washington Government approaches the meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the 21 American republics, spokesmen for 250,000,000 people, with no misgivings as to its epochal importance.

It is realized by State Department officials that the good-neighbor policy of Mr. Roosevelt, as enunciated by Secretary Hull, and the oft-strained cordiale that was established by the first Pan American Conference, presided over by Secretary of State James G. Blaine, in October 1889, face a crucial test.

The importance of the conference and its potentialities is exemplified by the fact that the initial agenda of June 29 has been broadened in scope and concept by the governing board of the Pan American Union.

It now even portends possible establishment of military and economic barriers, from the Great Lakes to the Falklands, that would make the Americas impregnable to aggression of any character from within and without.

MEETING TO DISCUSS AMERICAS' PROBLEMS

The final draft of the agenda of July 5 throws the meeting open for discussion of every vexatious and thorny problem that the Americas may face attributable to the rapidly changing political and economic conditions due to Nazi aggression. It even contemplates new and unforeseen happenings as they may react upon the sensitized minds of delegates from Spanish America.

In this conference, it is estimated that the United States holds the biggest stake. It suddenly realizes that the United States is far more defenseless economically south of the Rio Grande and its own Panama Canal than at home as to men and armaments. As to safety from foreign encroachment and loss of trade, the situation is viewed as alarmingly distressing.

This is why Secretary of State Hull plans to attend the conference and direct the interests of the United States, lest some untoward happenings mar the program.

The newly called Pan-American Conference is a corollary to the defense program launched by President Roosevelt as the forces of the Fuehrer blitzkrieged their way to the English Channel, and suddenly shook this country from lethargical complacence as to national security.

By the time the $5,000,000,000 defense program was well before Congress, with a full appreciation of its import, the reports of possible "fifth column" activities in this country, and their acknowledged existence in South American countries like the Argentine, Uruguay, and Brazil, caused concern, chiefly as they related to national defense.

As one European country after another fell before the German invasion, realization of the effect of such upon trade relations with the 20 countries of Latin America, that constitute the greatest outlet for the commerce of this country, dawned upon the United States Government.

This caused the belated realization that economically Germany, Italy, and Japan already had their column of commerce on the grounds, due to many years of infiltration.

As the capitulation of Paris appeared imminent with a possibility that Chancelor Hitler might lay claim to French possessions in the Western Hemisphere, Mr. Roosevelt declared as applicable the doctrine of James Monroe, as laid down by the fifth President when he said on December 2, 1823, that no European power could seize territory or set up a government on the American continent.

With the fall of Paris came passage of the Pittman-Bloom joint resolution by Congress that no non-American government should acquire by purchase, conquest, or otherwise, territory in the Western Hemisphere held by a non-American government.

Under Secretary Sumner Welles at press conference, June 19, said that this resolution "reaffirmed by Congress the principles of our traditional doctrine, though it was in no sense an extension of the doctrine."

The spontaneity with which presidents of Latin American republics replied to the invitation has been heartening to the State Department. In fact, the trend of replies indicates that the conference may resolve itself into a "Stop-Hitler drive," backed by every country represented.

This was indicated July 4 by President Alfredo Baldomir, of Uruguay, when he delivered an address by radio to President Roosevelt and the people of the Americas for a strong and aggresive Pan-Americanism.

President Roosevelt and his representatives are scheduled to meet this with generosity and enthusiasm. It would be backed at home by the $5,000,000,000 proposed for a supplemental defense program that will bring authorization at this session of Congress of approximately $14,000,000,000 that would be spent for defense.

In turn, the conference, as suggested by the expanded agenda is expected to adopt a cartel, providing:

1. Reaffirmation of the good-neighbor policy as enunciated at Montevideo at the Seventh Pan American Conference of 1933, when reciprocal-trade agreements were endorsed, and when the idea of nonintervention was reinforced in contradistinction to the previous policy as to Nicaragua and Haiti; reaffirmation of accord at the Eighth Pan American Conference in Lima in 1938 for solidarity and unity with consultation upon threats of invasion, and condemnation of infiltration of subversive elements; and reaffirmation of the general declaration of neutrality of the American republics, and establishment of the demarcations of safety zones in American waters as agreed upon at the Panama Conference of October 1939.

MONROE DOCTRINE TO BE APPROVED

2. Approval of the Monroe Doctrine as outlined by Secretary Hull July 4, when he warned rulers of totalitarian states that they must keep hands off the Americas (including non-American-owned islands), and as reasserted by Mr. Roosevelt, and embodied in the Pittman-Bloom Act.

3. That American republics cooperate in taking over possessions of Holland, France, and Great Britain if threatened by Germany.

4. Organization of a general defense program for the 20 republics cooperating with the United States, on land, sea, and in the air, financed by loans by the United States, probably guaranteed by exchange of raw products such as tin, rubber, chromite, antimony, tungsten, nitrates, coffee, panama hats, copper and silver, molybdenum, borax, lignite, asbestos, and especially many of the 29 strategic minerals, desired by the Inter-Departmental Munitions Board.

5. Adoption of an economic cartel under which a $5,000,000,000 pool would be formed to purchase surpluses of field and factories from the 20 South American countries for disposal in the United States and to European countries to combat Nazi and Italian penetration, with part of the $18,000,000,000 worth of gold buried at Fort Knox, Ky., used for this purchase.

6. Exchange of Army and Naval officers to improve the armies.

7. Consideration of further restriction of Nazi, Russian, and Italian immigration.

ADDITIONAL LOANS FOR TRANSPORTATION

8. Further loans by the Import-Export Bank for construction of railroads and highways, similar to recent loans to Ecuador and the Argentine.

The biggest stake for the United States is trade. Latin America now looms as the greatest possible outlet for products of the farms and factories of the United States, always attended by heavy surpluses. This has just been brought home to this country as a poignant reminder.

For example, exports of the United States to South America in May jumped to $40,332,000 from $22,668,000 in May 1939, with exports to Belgium dropping from $6,734,000 to $1,932,000. Similar decreases to England, France, Norway, and the Netherlands, with German trade almost nil, were reported. The United States now controls South American markets and plans to hold them when the European holocaust ends.

Regardless of this, the past attitude of Latin American countries, one of general suspicion, may still lurk in the background. This is attributable to the policy of the United States in dealing with Latin American countries. Such is chargeable to no one administration or political party, but more to a lack of understanding of Latin American people, who have in turn not always understood "Yankee enterprise."

During the decade preceding 1930 nearly $2,000,000,000 was loaned to the 12 countries south of the Canal by New York bankers. Their representatives swarmed over Latin America like locusts seeking borrowers. Much of this remains unpaid, and the aftermath has been unpleasant.

The presence of foreign elements in Latin America is not discounted. In fact, Uncle Sam, when he reaches the hinterland of South America, will find upward of 800,000 Germans in Brazil, more than 450,000 in the Argentine, 1,000 in Bolivia, 500 in Paraguay, and with the entire southern part of Chile in the hands of German farmers, who are as successful as any in the world.

HOW THE GERMANS GET A FOOTHOLD

They will be found on working and trading terms with Italians, who are in some places as numerous as Germans. For example, Brazil boasts of an Italian population of 8,000,000 to 10,000,000, who harvest the coffee crops of Sao Paulo, while in the Argentine are more than half this number.

Annually thousands of Italians swarm to Brazil for the coffee harvesting season and make enough money to live at home for 2 years without work. The wealthiest coffee growers and shippers in Brazil are Italians and Germans and the most powerful figures.

The German Government has already made encroachments upon Latin American trade. The system is simple and practical. A young German appears upon the scene and finds employment in an English, French, or United States business or export house. He is at his post at 6 in the morning, long before opening hours, and in the afternoon, when natives are at their siesta, he toils on.

He returns to his place of employment at night and toils far into the morning hours. He makes himself indispensable. Meanwhile young men from the United States, likewise employed, are on the golf course, in the pool or ball rooms, or night clubs, and soon fade from the picture.

Soon the young German enters business backed by the El Banco Aleman, the Bank of Germany.

EDITORIAL FROM A WESTERN NEWSPAPER

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I insert herewith an editorial from the August 3, 1940, issue of the South Haven Daily Tribune of South Haven, Mich., as reprinted from the Wallace (Idaho) Miner:

[From the Wallace (Idaho) Miner]

MR. HOOVER'S MISTAKES

An inspired piece from one of the New Deal propagandists says that "Hoover was a complete failure." So he was. He failed in a lot of things. He failed to draw out his salary of $75,000 a year while he was President, turning it all back into the Treasury. He failed to have his sons organize insurance-company firms to write insurance on Government enterprises. He built a Rapidan resort for fishing and recreation at his own expense and gave it to the Government. None of his sons went racing through the divorce courts to the disillusionment of the public. He never bundled up a lot of Government documents to sell as a book to the faithful at a huge profit to himself and he never sold himself into political slavery to a labor organization for a $500,000 campaign fund. He gathered a marvelous collection of war stuff and built a museum for it, but failed to ask Congress to pay the bill—he paid it himself.

He did not preach class hatred; nor try to pack the Supreme Court. He did not plow up every third row of cotton and he did not promise the American people one thing while at the same moment doing everything to accomplish the directly opposite result.

He did not ask Congress to assess the taxpayers a billion dollars every time someone shot off a firecracker in Europe, and he did not go on fishing trips on Government warships, accompanied by a fleet of destroyers; neither did he kill off all the farmers' little pigs nor encourage the importation of Argentine beef. In fact, there were a lot of foolish things that Hoover didn't do that some other people have done. There are a lot of constructive things he could have done if he had not had the opposition of a Democratic Congress, but, anyway, he did not leave the American people $45,000,000,000 in debt.

Mr. Speaker, each of the acts Mr. Hoover failed to do—and as listed above—is to his credit.

The Dire Need of the People of Nebraska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I called the attention of the Congress to the drought situation in the State of Nebraska. Since that time I have received many, many communications from Nebraska which indicate that the situation is much worse than previously indicated.

Nebraska people must have feed for their livestock immediately. Unless feed is furnished without delay, hundreds of farms will be entirely without horses, milk cows, and chickens. This will mean that great masses of people not only will be on relief but they will be without the means to make a livelihood when the drought period is over.

For some time I have been appealing to the Surplus Commodities Corporation to send into the drought-stricken territory of Nebraska surplus grains and feeds now held by the Government. If this cannot be a direct gift or grant, this feed should be sold at greatly reduced prices on the same basis that this material is dumped on foreign markets.

Are not these American citizens living in the drought-stricken territory of Nebraska entitled to as much consideration as the people of foreign lands? A most serious situation exists right in the heart of continental United States, yet the great Government of the United States at Washington is so engrossed in foreign affairs that this problem goes unnoticed.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to include in my remarks two letters that I have recently received. These letters are not from cranks. I know the source from which they come and they accurately picture conditions as they are:

ADAMS-WEBSTER NATIONAL FARM LOAN ASSOCIATION,
Hastings, Nebr., August 2, 1940.

Mr. CARL T. CURTIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CURTIS: As you are in Washington, I want to tell you of the conditions out here.

In the Adams-Webster National Farm Loan Association, which I have charge of, we have leases on 97 farms and the total income from wheat was $402. This is less than $5 per farm. Corn is all burned up. There will be some sorghums, if we would have a good general rain. The local showers don't do much good.

Farmers are rushing their livestock to market. Cows are selling at $21 per head and work horses at $40 per head. They are asking $12 to $14 per ton for hay trucked in and 70 cents per bushel for corn.

Seventy-five percent of the farmers will need subsistence grants and many will be too proud to ask for aid.

With all our surplus wheat and corn in storage, why can't seed wheat and corn for feed be released to farmers in this drought-stricken territory and let them pay it back bushel for bushel as soon as they raise a crop?

If this plan meets your approval your assistance will be greatly appreciated.

Very truly yours,

H. R. FAUSCH,
Secretary-Treasurer, Adams-Webster National Farm Loan Association.

Among the many other letters that I have received from my district is the following. The name of the sender is being withheld for obvious reasons:

JULY 29, 1940.

Representative CARL T. CURTIS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am a farmer's wife and writing not only in behalf of my own family but of hundreds and hundreds of farmers' families in south central and southwestern Nebraska.

If you have been living in Nebraska this summer, you know of the severe drought conditions; and if you could drive over Highway No. 3, you would see what the farmers are up against.

When the drought of 1934 came we made up our minds to stick it through, and after 7 years under the most disheartening conditions we are still trying to survive. In 1934 it was bad, but we had a lot behind us, and now, after 7 years, everything is gone and unless we get aid somehow the people here will surely perish.

We live only by means of our cream and egg checks. Our cows have gone dry because of no pastures, and our flocks of hens have been thrown into an early moult through the high temperatures of the past few weeks. Our means of support is being surely cut off until we cannot even buy the bare necessities for existence.

We have passed up the luxuries of life long ago. We are too poor to have a radio, a daily paper. We have not seen a picture show for years. Dentist bills are entirely out of the picture. Our finances do not permit us to attend church and Sunday school any more, and even fruits and vegetables have become such a luxury they no longer grace our tables.

We do not have clothing for winter and there is no way to buy it. In 5 more weeks the school bells will be ringing and our children will not be clothed to go—no shoes, overalls, shirts, dresses, no overshoes, coats, caps, mittens, no food for the dinner pails, and only a few eggs to sell at 9 cents per dozen.

Never have we asked for relief, only a loan through the F. S. A. to help us on our feet, that we might be able to hold up our heads and still be self-supporting citizens. This last spring we had to borrow $100 for seed and tractor fuel to put in a crop. For this we had to turn our conservation check back to the Government, and now we have nothing. With our conservation money we always paid our taxes, bought the car license, had our little girl's eyes cared for (progressive myopia is the trouble), and met the unseen expenses that always arise in every household.

There must be some misunderstanding about these drought years; surely Uncle Sam isn't so poor that he needs to take the very bread out of our little children's mouths to carry on his national affairs. I know people who left this country and went to California and have been on relief for years. No one has kept track of what they owe the Government, and they are not being reminded that they must pay it back in 5 years. It seems to have become a popular notion that this drought belongs to these disheartened, poorly fed, poorly clothed, bankrupt, poverty-stricken farmers and their families, and those in authority are adding up the interest each year even on the old unpaid feed loans of 1934.

In the June 26, 1940, issue of the United States News (and this is sent to us by a relative in Colorado, for we are too poor to pay the $2 per year subscription price) there is an article entitled "Famine in a World Glutted With Foods." How welcome some of this huge surplus in foods and cottons would be in our homes where the supply of towels, sheets, blankets, comforters, etc., has long been exhausted and cannot be replaced.

The tires are worn off our cars; the batteries run down; we are nearing the end of the trail.

This is a busy time at Washington, and your time is valuable, so I want to thank you for taking the time to read this letter. You may use it in any way you wish if it will be the means of helping bring relief to these stricken people.

I thank you and remain,

Yours respectfully,

(Signed by a lady residing in the Fourth Congressional District in Nebraska.)

Americans Detest One-Man Dominance

OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE DAILY OLYMPIAN, OLYMPIA, WASH.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Daily Olympian, of Olympia, Wash., of July 21, 1940:

AMERICANS DETEST ONE-MAN DOMINANCE

For many years George Washington and a Continental Army fought to establish a new kind of government in America. This government was to permit, among other things, freedom of action and thought and expression. They fought against tyranny and oppression, against the long-established custom of handing down power from father to son in an unbroken line. They won their battle; a new kind of government came into being.

But before it was formed, some of Washington's army officers started a movement to make him king of America. His reply was peremptory, even angry. In plain terms he stated his abhorrence of the proposal. He was against kings and all things autocratic.

Washington twice was elected President of the United States by the unanimous vote of electors, and could have served a third time. But he refused, resting on the desire to prevent the possibility of a despotism.

The United States Constitution provides that the President shall be re-eligible to office. No limitation against a third term is expressed or implied.

But Washington realized how great and varied are the powers of the President. He desired to protect the Nation against the temptation of unsurpation, and so he surrendered his authority at the end of two terms.

That is how America's most famous precedent was established, 144 years ago.

During the intervening years thousands of laws have been passed by Congress and written into the statute books. All of them have been broken from time to time by someone.

But the unwritten law, the tradition against a third term, has not been violated, was held in the highest respect—until the night of July 18, 1940.

Adherence to this tradition has been an important factor in the economic development of this country, in the preservation of liberty, in the promotion of happiness, just as Washington thought it would.

And now a man who discourses eloquently on the evils of dictatorships, who has led his country to the brink of war, who attempted to stuff the Supreme Court with his obedient stooges, who strived to influence the election of Congressmen, who has emptied the Treasury and created an unexampled debt, who has attempted to usurp the power delegated to the legislative branch of the Government, who "blitzkrieged" the friends who helped him ascend to political eminence, who implies his services are indispensable in this time of stress, who brought to the White House the greatest egomania possessed by any tenant of that dwelling—this man pleads with the Nation to join with him in the utter demolition of a tradition as old as the Republic.

This man cries out his hatred of dictators, but he proved in recent days that he is as much a dictator to a thousand men and women, representing millions more, as are any of the blood-spilling tyrants on the other sides of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

Where would this superegotist set the limit of his authority, were he returned to office?

Fortunately for the future of the Nation, his nomination does not mean election.

By November a vast majority of the voters probably will realize fully the extent of dangers that will come of one-man dominance, which Americans have detested since the day the Republic was founded.

The precedent established by Washington, whose stature as a leader increases with the passing of the years, must be preserved.

Purchasing Another Election

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, not content with endangering the very existence of our form of government by its drive to establish Roosevelt as a dictator, under the smoke screen of war hysteria which it has created, the New Deal is again on its corrupt way toward the purchase of another election.

Democratic Senator CARTER GLASS it was, who, on June 24, 1937, and you will find it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that date on page 6284, said:

> The last election was carried by people who were getting favors from the Government, people who were subsidized by the Government, people who were on relief rolls.

It is matter of common knowledge that, seeking votes, the President has sought and obtained extraordinary power and blank checks for unbelievable sums, some of the money appropriated specifically for relief.

A Democratic committee of the Senate established the fact indisputably that relief funds had been used to purchase political support.

Now, fearful that the war hysteria will not be sufficient to elect Roosevelt for a third term, the new dealers, whose continuance on the public pay roll is dependent upon his election, are again seeking to purchase the coming November election.

The gentleman from Michigan, Congressman PAUL SHAFER, of the Third District, in a statement issued yesterday, reveals this glaring and corrupt proposed use of relief money for political purposes. His statement shows that he has information disclosing a startling increase in the printing of blank relief checks and food stamps by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing during the past week.

The gentleman from Michigan, Congressman SHAFER, wrote:

> My information is that orders for 10,000,000 blank relief checks were received by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in the past week—more blank checks than have been printed in the last 9 months. Three million of these checks are printed for use in Minnesota, whose Governor is Harold E. Stassen. Other blank checks are for use in Illinois, New York, Michigan, and other political key States.
> I have also ascertained that more food stamps were shipped in 3 days during the past week by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing than have been shipped out in the entire history of the food-stamp plan. The present supply is going to Brooklyn, Minneapolis, Cleveland, and other politically strategic centers.
> I am fully aware of the serious nature of the implications contained in my statement regarding these developments, and if the past performance of the administration had not been what it has been, I would hesitate to make public these facts and bring them to the floor of the House of Representatives. We must remember, however, that despite the fact that Harry Hopkins, then the Administrator of the W. P. A., in an address delivered on May 8, 1938, said:
>
> "Anyone who uses his position with the W. P. A. in any way to influence the votes of others by threat or intimidation would be dismissed."
>
> Nevertheless the President's chief relief officials have made many political statements designed to influence relief votes.
> Aubrey Williams, then Deputy Administrator of W. P. A., now head of the National Youth Administration, in a speech to the Workers' Alliance, Washington, D. C., June 27, 1938, said:
> "You know your friends very well. Just judge the folks who come and ask for your support by the crowd they run with. * * * The people who stand for Government support of work-relief measures are those who are going to win the election."
> Incidentally, I find that in addition to the 10,000,000 relief checks, 700,000 of new checks have been ordered by N. Y. A. to be administered by Mr. Williams.
>
> Harry Hopkins, then Administrator of the W. P. A., now Secretary of Commerce and one of the directing heads of the New Deal campaign, said in a press conference on July 21, 1938:
> "We got about 3,000,000 people working for us, and they are Americans like ourselves, and no one can tell them how to vote. * * * They have their own political views, and incidentally I think I know what their views are. * * * At least 90 percent of them are for Roosevelt."
>
> Keeping in mind this sudden and significant, not to say startling, increase in the orders for blank checks, it becomes a remarkable coincidence that the number of persons on the Federal relief rolls have in the past increased greatly from June through October in each election year. Thus in 1933, a nonelection year, the number of persons on Federal relief declined 15.4 percent during these months, although the index of industrial production, reflecting employment, declined 16.5 percent in that period. Yet in the election year of 1934 the number of persons on Federal relief increased 11.6 percent from June through October.
> In 1935, a nonelection year, the Federal relief rolls showed a decline of 9.6 percent from June through October; but in 1936, an election year, the Federal relief rolls increased 14.4 percent, although unemployment had been reduced 13 percent. In 1937, when there was no election, the Federal relief rolls showed a decline of 16.9 percent from June through October, although the index of production declined 10.5 percent in that period. But in 1938, an election year, the Federal relief rolls showed an increase of 19.2 percent, although unemployment declined 9 percent from June through October. In 1939, when there was no election, the number on relief declined 25.5 percent for the months preceding the usual election date.
> The Senate Committee to Investigate Campaign Expenditures and the Use of Government Funds in the Campaign of 1938 composed of one Republican and four Democratic Senators, under the chairmanship of Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas, reported that all over the country pressure was brought to bear on relief workers, relief funds were wrongfully used for political purposes, and the committee found that especially deplorable conditions existed in Kentucky.
> Under the circumstances, and in view of this record in the past, this startling and sudden increase in the number of relief checks has a significance which cannot be ignored. Ten million blank relief checks will, whether or not it is so intended, reach and perhaps influence a lot of voters. The free gift of food by the use of food stamps, the distribution of which is under the authority of Henry A. Wallace, the New Deal Vice-Presidential candidate, will reach a lot of voters who naturally would be expected to feel friendly to the administration which gave them this food.
> This certainly is a situation in which the old adage has a direct application: "Where there is so much smoke, there's bound to be some fire."

Mr. Speaker, so consumed by his ambition for personal power is the President, that, as stated by Raymond Clapper, his personal friend and who heretofore has been very sympathetic with the New Deal, he was "betrayed into the monumental and historic deception which he now places on the record"—with reference to his desire for a third term.

It is remembered that Roosevelt himself, at New York on November 3, 1932, quoting President Wilson, said: "There is no indispensable man."

Roosevelt also made the statement that there were no "master minds," no "supermen" in Washington.

But now, overwhelmed by his urge to grasp for himself the powers of a dictator, to change our form of government, to use those powers which he said had been returned to Washington and which he said were sufficient to "provide shackles for the liberties of the people," the President is not only attempting, by creating a fear of foreign invasion in the minds of our people, to grasp the reins of government but seeks to use money appropriated for our own unfortunate to purchase political support to maintain himself in office.

Should not our people, who have always heretofore been insistent that public officials be truthful and honest and show a high degree of political morality, overwhelmingly defeat the man they trusted, the man who has betrayed them, and who would destroy our form of government?

My Report to the People of Lewis County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my established practice, I hereby render my report and account of my official record to the citizens of Lewis County.

I agree with the many thousands of citizens who have written to me that our first task remains that of keeping our country out of war. I shall continue my vigorous support of neutrality legislation. We are the only neutral nation in the world whose ships and citizens have not been attacked.

I shall cooperate vigorously in supporting President Roosevelt's national-defense program, and am remaining at my post of duty in order to do so.

May I take this opportunity to sincerely thank my fellow citizens for their kind expressions of approval of my work in Congress—their generous letters have been a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Influence in Congress depends upon seniority of service on important committees. Why throw away the influence of seniority and experience? What do candidates have to offer except their own personal ambition? I now rank sixth out of a membership of 27 on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, having started at the bottom of the ladder in 1933. As a direct result we have had more regular worthy river and harbor, jetty, and flood-control projects approved and carried out in southwest Washington during my period of service than during the entire previous history of our State. It is also my privilege to be chairman of the Pensions Committee, which gives me added rank and prestige in the House. I also am serving on the important Committee on Education, vital to the students and faculties in our public schools and colleges, and on the Indian Affairs and War Claims Committees.

When politicians are desperate they sometimes resort to issues of the most trivial and amusing nature, and this year for the first time the Congressman's ccunty of legal residence is seemingly being made such an issue.

I have been a permanent resident of southwest Washington for 30 years and have been continuously visiting all the communities in the district and am therefore thoroughly familiar with conditions and problems in every community. However, length of residence in the district is important, for a comparative newcomer from a distant part of the State could not be expected to know our people nor our problems and would consequently not be qualified to represent our interests effectively.

The particular city or county in which the Congressman resides has absolutely no bearing on his effectiveness to serve his district, which depends on his length of service, his rank, and his experience.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, who is retiring after 24 years in Congress, paid a tribute the other day to the seasoned Members of the House.

The rest of the States, he said, should follow the example of Texas in reelecting its Congressmen, then they would control more committee chairmanships. Texas, with 21 Members in the House today, holds 5 chairmanships, he pointed out. It is exceeded only by New York, with 6 out of its 45 Members holding committee chairmanships. The Texas Congressman ended by quoting former Speaker Champ Clark:

A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

IMPROVED BUSINESS CONDITIONS

The steady improvement in business conditions and recovery from the depths of 1929–33 continues.

I shall never forget the gloom and despair of the merchants, laborers, farmers, and citizens generally in 1932 when I visited Centralia, Chehalis, Winlock, Vader, Onalaska, Dryad, Alpha, Mossyrock, Toledo, Pe Ell, Morton, Glenoma, Little Rock, Mineral, Randle, Napavine, Doty, Packwood, and all the other communities of Lewis County. There were hardly any jobs or money in circulation; prices were down, and there was no market. Conditions are vastly different now, and we are far better situated than we were then.

GOVERNMENT AID AND COOPERATION

Not only has this beneficial change been wrought, but our Government has also aided and cooperated in the construction of many worth-while projects which make our local communities better places in which to live.

CENTRALIA POST OFFICE

The citizens of Centralia had sought a new Federal post-office building for more than 20 years. In 1933, upon taking my seat in Congress, I introduced my first bill to provide such a structure for this progressive community. Our efforts to obtain authorization and allocation of funds culminated in success in 1935, but due to delays caused by disagreements in regard to site, actual construction was not commenced until 1937. On October 15, 1937, a new, modern, and commodious structure was dedicated by Postmaster General James A. Farley, which was the first post-office building in the history of western Washington to be dedicated personally by a Postmaster General of the United States. The site, building, furnishings, and fixtures cost $76,377.

In his dedicatory address Postmaster General Farley, in referring to my work and record in Congress, said:

I am especially delighted today to be in Centralia with my good friend, your Congressman, MARTIN F. SMITH. This district may well be proud of Congressman SMITH's able representation in the House of Representatives. He has at all times supported the Administration and President Roosevelt in his efforts to be of assistance to the people. I congratulate this district upon its good judgment in selecting as its Representative Congressman SMITH, and I hope that you will keep him in Washington as long as he cares to remain.

Bills for post-office buildings at Winlock, Pe Ell, and other growing communities in Lewis County have been advanced to favorable position and they will be constructed whenever a new public-building program is undertaken, depending upon the duration of the national-defense emergency.

CHEHALIS PROJECTS

There are few communities in the State and Nation, based upon population, which have had as many improvements made by the Federal Government as Chehalis. Altogether some 25 Federal projects, aggregating over $300,000, have been constructed, consisting of fairground buildings, parks, streets, sidewalks, water mains, a dozen different school projects, playgrounds, tennis courts, and various other community projects of permanent value. Centralia, including Borst Park, has received a great diversity of municipal and school projects, too numerous to mention.

WHITE PASS HIGHWAY

During the period of my service in Congress I have cooperated actively with the citizens and communities of southwest Washington in furthering the completion of the White Pass Highway. I succeeded several years ago in obtaining allocation of funds through the United States Bureau of Public Roads and more recently Federal forestry funds. The Federal Government has made substantial contributions toward the construction of this important link in our highway system, so vitally important to Lewis County and all of southwest Washington. I am now stressing its importance as a link in our national defense, as no funds have been allotted this year on account of the emergency national-defense program.

COOPERATION REGARDING LEWIS COUNTY PRODUCTS

It has been my privilege to cooperate vigorously with the Chehalis Brick & Tile Co., George H. Burrows, president and manager, Centralia coal dealers, miners, and other business firms in behalf of the use of local products and the employing of local labor on Government contracts.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

During the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, there was expended by the Federal Government in Lewis County the sum of $5,260,224, and loaned therein the additional sum of $2,456,109, a total of $7,716,333.

County roads, school, power-transmission lines, fish ladders, flood control, armory, parks, playgrounds, sanitation, streets, sidewalks, sewers, county mapping, water mains, city-buildings projects have been provided and will constitute valuable community assets for many years to come and serve future generations as well as our own.

MY PROGRESSIVE LABOR RECORD

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress, I have supported and voted for every piece of legislation of benefit to labor. I realize that our business prosperity is measured by the income and wages received by labor and agriculture. I have therefore supported their reasonable demands 100 percent. We have conferred upon labor the same right as that enjoyed by their employers, viz, to bargain collectively in regard to wages, working hours, and working conditions. I have had the active support of every branch of organized labor and the railroad brotherhoods ever since I have been a Member of Congress and intend to continue to merit and deserve their support in the future as I have in the past. I have likewise heartily supported all legislation designed to accord to our Federal and postal workers more liberal treatment. They serve the public faithfully and efficiently and should be treated accordingly.

WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

For 4 years I served as a member of the steering committee of 22 House Members, which led the successful fight for the soldiers' bonus. Instead of paying our veterans in bullets, tear bombs, and poison gas, the way the bonus army was paid, we paid in cash in 1936 the bonus which had been delinquent since 1924. Veterans in Lewis County thus received $872,661.14.

I have sponsored two bills familiar to every Spanish War veteran—the Smith bill of 1935, paying their pensions in full, and the Philippine travel-pay bill of 1940, as well as numerous other measures for hospitalization, increased benefits, and so forth.

I have favored every bill in the interests of the veterans of the World War, their widows, and dependents which has come before Congress, and am nationally known for my active support of veterans' legislation. I shall continue this policy, for it is my firm belief that it is the solemn duty and sacred obligation of our Government never to forget but always to remember and to compensate to the fullest possible extent those who have defended our Republic. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have always received from the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United Spanish War Veterans, the Disabled American Veterans, and their auxiliaries.

FEDERAL HOUSING—HOME-OWNERS' LOANS—BANK AND SAVINGS AND LOAN DEPOSITS

As one of the 5 Members of the House who conferred with President Roosevelt March 20, 1934, and sponsored the first housing legislation in Congress, I am gratified at the benefits which have accrued therefrom to our people. In Lewis County 132 citizens have received loans aggregating $258,250 for the construction, modernization, and repair of their homes. This has been of vast benefit to the workers in the buildings trades, including electricians, painters, and plumbers, and the lumber, plywood, shingle, and other allied industries.

I actively supported the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act and am glad that 338 citizens in Lewis County have received loans aggregating $471,131.72. I expressed my belief in this legislation on April 28, 1933, in these words:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to render available the sum of $2,000,000,000 to restore, redeem, rehabilitate, and save the homes of many of the American people; and, Mr. Speaker, when we save the homes of the American people, we save America.

Depositors in the 7 banks in Lewis County have their deposits up to $5,000 insured by the Federal Government under the acts of Congress which I heartily supported and voted for. The 4,392 depositors in 3 savings and loan associations likewise have their deposits insured under the same legislation. I am happy and proud that the Roosevelt administration has provided this protection and security for our people and that it has been my privilege to have a humble part in bringing about these great reforms which should have been introduced many years ago.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

As an active member of the House Committee on Education, I have vigorously favored providing in public-works and relief appropriation bills adequate funds to aid in paying the salaries of school teachers and maintain, repair, and improve our public-school buildings, as well as institutions of higher learning, as I consider the cause of public education and the recommendations of our parent-teacher associations to be paramount.

I favor the following program:

First. Adequate free public education for the children of the United States.

Second. Adequate pay for public-school teachers as a matter of justice and as a means of retaining in and attracting to the teaching profession the most competent, devoted, and best-equipped men and women.

Third. An annual minimum of at least 8 months' teaching in the public schools of all the States.

Fourth. An adequate number of safe, commodious, and well-equipped school buildings.

Fifth. Free textbooks for all public-school pupils.

Sixth. Adequate assistance by the Federal Government through appropriations and otherwise, in accomplishing the foregoing objects.

Seventh. Such of the allied purposes as may serve the best interests of the teachers and pupils and the parent-teachers' associations in making the public schools a more effective, far-reaching, and American force in local, State, and national life.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

I have been an ardent, outspoken advocate of old-age pensions during my service in Congress. I have continued the interest which as a veteran member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles I have manifested for the past 25 years. I have on every occasion promptly signed every petition to bring old-age pension and general-welfare legislation before the Congress for action.

I was the first Member of Congress to publicly espouse the Townsend plan in 1934 and in a brief 6 years have, as a member of our steering committee, actively participated in the growth of our movement until today we are approximating a sufficient following in the House of Representatives to enact our legislation in its present form into law. The United States Senate recently for the first time authorized a thorough study of the Townsend plan. In view of this progress we confidently expect to reelect enough of our old supporters and elect a sufficient number of new supporters in the elections this year to enact H. R. 8264 into law in the next Congress.

FARM LEGISLATION

The farm problem is recognized as the most difficult with which we have to deal, having been acute since 1920. We have done more for the farmer than any previous national administration and have since 1932 doubled our farm income. We have recaptured our lost foreign export trade in agricultural products, without sacrificing our home markets, and should you desire the official Government statistics bearing on this entire subject, please write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., or write to me, and I shall be glad to obtain them for you. Self-seeking politicians running for office do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the facts. Therefore, if you are interested in ascertaining the true facts, I shall be glad to assist you in doing so. We have not entirely solved the farm problem but we have made more progress toward a solution than any previous national administration.

The condition of the farmer everywhere is much better than it was in 1932, when his prices and market were the worst in the history of American agriculture. Think back to 1932 and compare the lot of the average farmer in your own neighborhood as it was then with his condition today in 1940 and you will realize this fact. We intend to keep on helping the farmer. It remains my opinion that the Grange cost-of-production plan, to insure the farmer parity prices with industry, offers the best solution of the farm problem. In the next Congress I shall again vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture and would be glad to have you verify this fact by writing to Mr. Ervin E. King, master of the Washington State Grange, 3104 Western Avenue, Seattle, Wash., or Mr. Fred Brenckman, legislative representative, National Grange, 1343 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES

One of the most important enterprises which can be encouraged by the Federal Government is the developing, propagating, and conserving of our fish and game resources. I have, therefore, at all times cooperated with the House Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources and the various pogy, wildlife, sportsmen's, game, and rod and gun clubs and associations in southwest Washington. I voted for the Robertson-Pittman Act last year and the appropriation this year of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. The Federal contribution to our State is estimated at $60,575, to be matched by the State contributing $20,191.66, a total of $80,766.66. I have actively cooperated in obtaining W. P. A. and Federal funds for fish hatcheries, fishponds, and fish and game preserves and wildlife projects in southwest Washington.

I have given prompt attention to the requests received from the holders of fish and game licenses in southwest Washington for information regarding the Federal laws and pending legislation relating to the subject of wildlife.

BONNEVILLE—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

I am proud of my sponsorship of the $70,000,000 Bonneville project and rural-electrification projects and shall exert every effort to bring their benefits to all our citizens.

LUMBER, SHINGLES, PULP, PLYWOOD INDUSTRIES

During my entire service in Congress on every occasion, without a single exception, I have supported and voted for beneficial legislation desired by the lumber, shingle, pulp, and plywood industries and advantageous to their workers, and have at all times extended to them my wholehearted cooperation. Self-seeking politicians apparently have no scruples in misrepresenting the facts. Therefore, if you wish to verify my statement in regard to my official record, I would suggest that you write to the official legislative representatives of the organizations to which our local industries belong: Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager, West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 364 Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., 340 White-Henry-Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; Henry Bahr, counsel, National Lumber Manufacturers Association, 1337 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C.; Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, Tacoma Building, Tacoma, Wash.; O. M. Porter, secretary, United States Pulp Producers Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

In the general election 2 years ago, in 1938, my Republican opponent had the nerve to display a bundle of shingles and talk about protection for shingles. At that time and for 5 years previously, the shingle industry and workers enjoyed a 25-percent quota, the only protection in 25 years. The Republicans kept shingles on the duty-free list for 25 years, without any quota, causing Senator HOMER T. BONE in the campaign in 1932 to say:

The shingle industry was ruined because of this fact.

In the period since I took my seat in Congress in 1933, the shingle industry has been revived, old mills remodeled and equipped with new machinery, and new mills built, until now we have three times as many plants and number of shingle weavers employed as in 1932.

November 18, 1935, Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

I hasten to send you this brief note to thank you for the fine help we received from you in our fight to secure the import quota on Canadian shingles. I want to express to you my appreciation of your efforts in our behalf.

To render the quota more effective, I introduced the bill which became law for a census of the shingle industry. On May 27, 1937, Mr. McGrath wrote when President Roosevelt signed my bill:

This news is about the most important that has come to red-cedar shingle manufacturers and the logging and lumber operators associated with the shingle business.

February 1, 1938, the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

At the annual membership meeting of this association, held in Tacoma February 1, 1938, a resolution was unanimously approved instructing the secretary to write you expressing the gratitude of this association for your faithful services in our behalf in connection with the import limitations on red-cedar shingles.

On November 2, 1938, the following news article was published in the Hoquiam Washingtonian:

Shingle weavers commend SMITH. A resolution endorsing MARTIN F. SMITH in his campaign for reelection to Congress was passed this week by Grays Harbor Shingle Weavers, Local 2576. The resolution endorsing SMITH is being sent to all shingle weaver unions in the district council. The resolution commends Congressman SMITH for diligent work in limiting importation of Canadian shingles into the United States.

In this Congress I have actively cooperated in efforts to secure aid for the workers and the shingle industry. Following vigorous efforts before the State Department and Ways and Means Committee, we have recently secured the passage of a bill providing for a duty of 25 cents per square on red-cedar shingles imported from Canada, the first duty imposed in 29 years. On June 28, 1940, David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

The final passage of our shingle bill in the Senate on June 22 brings to a conclusion the long struggle to put shingles back on the duty list. To say that we are pleased expresses our feeling very mildly.

Having full knowledge of the difficulty of getting a tariff bill through Congress, and particularly one giving protection to the shingle or lumber industries, we are grateful for the continuous thought and effort you have given our affairs.

All during the struggle, since January 1, it has been heartening to know that you were tirelessly working for the passage of our shingle bill, and it has been of great value to the writer to be able to confer with you at any time when a conference was deemed necessary. You have been "on the job" for us, and we are very appreciative.

With best wishes for your continued success, we remain,

Yours truly,

UNITED STATES RED CEDAR SHINGLE INDUSTRY, INC.,
By DAVID M. WILLIAMS,
Secretary-Manager.

I would suggest that when the candidates of the opposing party talk about shingles that citizens ask them about the do-nothing record of their party for 25 years, and the do-something record of the Roosevelt administration and request an explanation. I would appreciate citizens writing me briefly what explanation, if any, they give. I am curious, as you must be, after reading the foregoing recital of facts, to know what alibi and excuse they have to offer.

LUMBER EXCISE TAX

The lumber business is the best it has been in 10 years. Last year pay rolls and wages in private industry were the highest in the history of the State.

A candidate for Congress should have respect for the voters and for the office he is seeking. What about the candidate who deliberately circulates malicious falsehoods? Two years ago, and again this year, the same falsehood is being circulated and published that Members of Congress from our State, including myself, voted to reduce the excise tax on lumber. The best answer to this campaign lie was made December 12, 1938, by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager and legislative representative of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, of which our local lumber firms are members:

The west coast lumber industry has had the effective and loyal support of Mr. SMITH on every occasion when we have been asking for his help. He has voted for renewal of the excise tax on imported lumber on every occasion when the matter has been before Congress. He has supported our efforts to have lumber properly defined for taxing purposes, as in the classification of large timbers and with withdrawal of allowances for planing and milling. He has helped us in every question arising for the clarification and administration of the excise tax.

The West Coast Lumbermen's Association keeps wholly out of politics. I just want, as a matter of fairness, to point out that Mr. SMITH has been a very loyal and conscientious supporter of the interests of the lumber industry since he entered Congress. I feel it only square that this fact be made known.

Sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Secretary-Manager.

My amendment of the lumber import excise tax, known as the Smith Amendment, introduced as H. R. 7934, was attached to the Revenue Act in 1938 and passed the Senate, was approved by President Roosevelt and became law. It prevents deductions for tonguing, planing, and grooving of imported lumber and is estimated to increase about 25 percent the excise tax, which is the tax unscrupulous candidates for Congress falsely accuse me of voting to reduce. April 4, 1938, Henry Bahr, counsel for the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, wrote me as follows:

Regarding your amendment of the lumber import excise tax, which was tacked on to the revenue bill in the Ways and Means Committee and retained by the Senate last week, I am sure Colonel Greeley must have told you how sincerely we appreciate your helpful cooperation in this matter.

Candidates of the opposite party should be asked by the voters why their party under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930 and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922 left lumber and shingles on the duty-free list, without any import excise tax or quota limitation, and provided 100 percent free trade with Canada. Such an explanation, if made, would be interesting, probably amusing.

PULP LEGISLATION

I am the author of H. R. 7312, the Smith bill, to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921, to plug up and curtail importations of foreign pulp in competition with our local product. This bill has received wide support from the pulp and sulfite workers' unions and the manufacturers. It has strong support in Congress. The United States Pulp Producers Association, O. M. Porter, has written me as follows:

I am very glad to be able to tell you that the executive committee of this association has instructed me to do everything possible toward developing Nation-wide support of your bill (H. R. 7312) to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921.

The changed conditions suddenly caused by the invasion of the Scandinavian countries and removal temporarily of competition from that quarter has deferred immediate action, but the legislation is in fine shape for consideration in the next Congress.

PEELER-LOG LEGISLATION

Past national administrations have permitted the exporting of peeler logs without hindrance so many years that now this, too, has created a problem to deal with. This has nothing to do with the reciprocal-trade agreements, which have made no change whatsoever. The question is simply one of whether we should limit the export of raw materials, the supply of which is becoming limited on account of our generosity in the past, which we now need for our own domestic use and manufacture by our own labor. I have vigorously favored the enactment of this legislation, which presents difficulties because it establishes a new precedent. Past neglect always renders application of the remedy difficult. The outlook for the enactment of this legislation in the near future is favorable on account of the hearings which have been held and the efforts which have been put forth in its behalf by the entire Washington congressional delegation. On May 24, 1940, Mr. Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, with which plywood manufacturers in southwest Washington are affiliated, wrote me:

The board of directors held its annual meeting on May 21, and I was directed to express to you the board's appreciation of the valuable assistance which you have given in the peeler-log matter.

APPOINTMENTS TO WEST POINT AND ANNAPOLIS

Reginald J. Clizbe, son of Mr. and Mrs. Ira J. Clizbe, 501 South Washington Avenue, Centralia, who was appointed to the United States Military Academy at West Point on my recommendation, graduated with honors this year.

Richard L. Evans, of Chehalis, was appointed to the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis on my recommendation and is due to graduate in 1942.

William F. Jennings, of Centralia, was appointed to the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis on my recommendation, graduated with honors in 1938, and is now an ensign on the destroyer MacDonough.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION—CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The National Youth Administration has made a splendid record in the State of Washington, and many young men and women in my district have greatly benefited from the program. Through the office of Mr. John H. Binns, Washington State administrator of the N. Y. A., I have obtained official figures on the out-of-school program and the school-work program which reflect the actual earnings of the young people. However, the figures on the college-work program do not take into account students living in my district but attending college elsewhere. There are, of course, a great many young men and women from southwest Washington at the University of Washington, Washington State College, and elsewhere, and they are receiving their full share of the college-work funds. In Lewis County a total of 113 young men and women have participated in the out-of-school work program, receiving total monthly earnings of $1,695. Under the college-work program there are 13 students attending Centralia Junior College, with a total yearly quota of $1,350. Twelve schools of Lewis County are included in the school-work program, with a total of 145 student workers and a total yearly quota of $4,644.

The useful and constructive work performed by the young men in the C. C. C. camps has received universal praise. In my district, in addition to building trails, roads, bridges, the prevention of floods and soil erosion, and other public improvements, their services in effectively fighting forest fires has resulted in a saving of millions of dollars. The young men themselves have benefited greatly from the training and instruction which they have received, and, of course, their own compensation and the allotments to their dependents have provided added purchasing power. The expenditures for materials and supplies in the vicinity of the camps have been a direct benefit to numerous business firms and merchants. C. C. C. camps have been in operation in practically every county in my district and the entire State of Washington.

AMERICA FOREVER—COMMUNISM, FASCISM, NAZI-ISM NEVER

On June 22, 1940, I voted for H. R. 5138, the most thorough and far-reaching revision of our immigration and deportation laws in the past 25 years. It is directed against all subversive, "fifth column," and un-American activities and provides punishment for those who attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. H. R. 5138 as amended was carefully considered and provides effective remedies against all foreign "isms" without violating our Constitution and American traditions.

My friends, we have the finest country and best Government on earth. Let us keep them that way. There is no room in America for communism, fascism, nazi-ism. There is room for only one "ism," and that is Americanism. We are going to keep America out of Europe, and we are going to keep Europe out of America.

Revival of Pan American Games

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald of June 23, 1940:

[From the Times-Herald of June 23, 1940]

STRAIGHT FROM THE SHOULDER—AN OPEN LETTER TO F. D. R.

(By Vincent X. Flaherty)

Dear Mr. President, we are no expert on national and international topics. Neither do we profess any great knowledge of diplomacy as defined by the State Department. We are not well enough versed upon current topics to consider ourself either an interventionist or an isolationist. Possibly, because we aren't quick to soak up the things we read and hear and store them away in our mental locker room as concrete facts.

If we belong to any school of thought, we're probably qualified to hold a back-row seat in what George Marshall calls the "common sensenist" party, whose headquarters are located in most American homes. But we do know a little about sport, its attractiveness to the peoples of the world, and this thing they call crowd psychology. Well, at least we think we do.

So now, at this time when there is much talk about the spreading of good will among the peoples of the Western Hemisphere, the "common-sensenist" crops out in us enough to make us believe the United States is missing the greatest bet of all in weaving the Pan-American countries together in a closely knitted oneness. And we allude to sports.

Sports, more than all the diplomatic back patting and hand clasping, can accomplish more in 1 day than any other medium might accomplish in months or years. It is the language of the world and not understood in only one county, State, province, or country. And the athletic field is the universal meeting ground of common understanding.

WHY NOT REVIVE PAN-AMERICAN GAMES?

So why not now revive the pan-American games which George Marshall promoted in connection with the Texas Centennial in 1937 at Dallas? For the most part, it would be a self-supporting proposition and would not require any great outlaying of cash.

The first pan-American games were witnessed by more than 100,000 persons, although the attendances were largely made up of native Texans. Moreover, the Little Olympics of Dallas were staged on a minor scale, compared to the great dimensions a revival of the games might reach. And what more appropriate site could one desire than the Nation's Capital for a renewal of this great track and field classic?

Among the pan-American countries represented at Dallas were Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Peru, Uruguay, Venezuela, Canada, and the United States. The greatest of Latin-American athletes went to complete the pounding panorama, and more than 25,000 news stories flooded the Americas as newspapermen from all sections of the Western Hemisphere filed accounts to their homelands. Likewise, radio broadcasts covered all of South America, and news reels carried pictorial accounts of the games into Montreal, New York, and Rio de Janeiro.

Every spectator who saw the games came away with a newer and deeper confidence in Latin American nations because of the skill, courage, and sportsmanship displayed by their athletes. On the other hand, Latin American participants left for their homes with a more wholesome respect for the United States because of its great athletes, the fairness of its sports fans, and the warm hospitality they received. Sports, like no other medium, can accomplish that.

MUST FIRST HAVE STADIUM HERE

Of course, Washington, D. C., must first have a suitable stadium to house such a great spectacle. And though voteless Washingtonians have fought for years for a stadium, our thought of bringing back the pan-American games alive isn't particularly used as a means toward that end. Our primary interest is offering sports as a panacea for the pan-American problem. And a stadium for Washington is less than a secondary motive.

On May 16, 1940, Representative JACK NICHOLS introduced a bill before the House of Representatives identified as H. R. 9797. And that bill could provide a stadium which would pay for itself in time. It would more than fit the needs of the pan-American games.

We do not expect to enlighten you, Mr. President, upon the values of athletics. We are quite familiar with your football and baseball background at Groton. How you won the running high kick and created a Groton record, which still stands, during your prep-school years. We are acquainted, too, with the facts concerning your prowess on the Nashua River as an oarsman, and how you ultimately made the Newell crew at Harvard.

So we need not tell you how the heat of competitive sport breeds good fellowship in the after hours. Nor need we illustrate the night after an Army-Navy game as an example of the good will which results when Navy's midshipmen and the cadets of West Point band together in convivial groups, win, lose, or tie.

So why not start this international league of friendliness in the Nation's Capital and then let the Latin-American nations alternate in playing host to us in ensuing years until it is our turn to bring our South American friends back again? For sport is the greatest ambassador of good will the world has ever known, and it nullifies the hypocrisy of platinumed oratory and shows of tinseled culture. It is that real!

The Ramparts We Watch—America, What of the Morrow?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. HOMER D. ANGELL, OF OREGON

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following radio address which I delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System, Wednesday, July 31, 1940, from the studios of WJSV, Columbia's station for the Nation's Capital. The address is as follows:

THE RAMPARTS WE WATCH—AMERICA WHAT OF THE MORROW?

Summer heat has descended upon Washington in all its intensity. Many of the Federal departments have been compelled, by reason of the excessive heat and humidity, to dismiss their staffs early in the afternoons. Congress, however, is in session. On June 11 the President stated that there seemed to be no reason why Congress could not clean up its work in a couple of weeks and adjourn. However, the President in his third-term acceptance speech said:

"Events move so fast in other parts of the world that it has become my duty to remain either in the White House or at some nearby point where I can reach Washington, and even Europe and Asia, by direct telephone; where, if need be, I can be back at my desk in the space of a very few hours."

Those of us who from the outset have opposed adjournment and who have had to do with the extensive program of legislation for national defense still uncompleted, and with the necessary changes in the program almost from day to day, realize more fully now than ever that the most serious mistake Congress could make would be to adjourn during these critical times. If it is necessary that the President remain at or near his desk, it is equally important that the Congress, which alone can pass the needed legislation and provide for the national defense, should remain at work. The welfare of the Nation must come first. The political fortunes or personal welfare of Members of the Congress are unimportant when the welfare of the Nation is involved.

There are two major issues confronting the Congress today. The first is our national defense. In the last 7 years we have expended billions of dollars in a vain attempt to restore prosperity to America. While we engaged in practically every sort of project to provide employment for the millions of idle American workers, we completely neglected our national defense, with 10,000,000 workers unemployed and available for the task. At the time the present administration assumed office the totalitarian powers of Europe began their programs, building war machines with which to subjugate the world. Unquestionably our accredited representatives at these foreign capitals were fully aware of this feverish activity in building these superwar facilities. Otherwise they were derelict in their duties. Nevertheless, the administration permitted our own defenses to lag until now we find ourselves miserably equipped and wholly unprepared for any major conflict.

The Congress is now endeavoring to remedy the error by passing the needed legislation for preparedness against any attack. The Congress has already voted at this session more than $15,500,000,000 in appropriations and contract authorizations. Requests still before the Congress will bring the total to more than $20,000,000,000. Senator WALSH has estimated that the two-ocean navy bill just signed by the President will cost the taxpayers $10,000,000,000. However, the mere authorization and appropriation of the funds for military, naval, and air equipment and personnel will not insure adequate defense. These appropriations must be transformed into guns, munitions, ships, bombing planes, mechanized equipment, and other modern implements of warfare. To do so requires complete mobilization of our industrial enterprises and our manpower. It cannot be done overnight. It will require years. The expenditures we have already authorized will be only a first payment on an armament-cost bill that will exceed many times these original outlays and will involve a continuing yearly expense for maintenance running into billions. The problem confronting the Congress today is to insure that these vast armaments shall be dedicated to defense and not offense—that we shall make clear to all that we are providing the means to defend ourselves against attack but not to engage in intervention or foreign expeditions. The Congress should remain at its post of duty until this objective is accomplished and until this emergency is over. Such a course will be our best assurance against being drawn into the European war. It is not enough that we refrain from sending our soldiers overseas. We must see to it that America is kept out of the war—by intervention or otherwise.

This whole preparedness program is preliminary to the other major problem confronting the Congress today, namely, the protection and preservation of our American democracy for ourselves and future generations. It is useless to provide these immense armaments unless we make sure that the thing we hold most dear—the American way of life—will be preserved by their use.

On July 4, 1776, our forebears established here on American soil a new concept of government. It has come to be known as American democracy, although strictly speaking it is a Republican form of government. It is a government of free men. Abraham Lincoln described it as a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people. As we look overseas today we find the Old World has almost completely repudiated this concept of government which we hold dear. For over 140 years our American democratic way has been a model for other countries in their endeavor to throw off the yoke of slavery and assume the status of free men. But for almost a quarter of a century now we have seen spreading throughout Europe and Asia an ideology of government based upon a concept diametrically opposed to the American plan. Instead of protecting the freedom of the individual by government, it seeks to submerge the individual in the state and to make him a slave of the state, and to establish a totalitarian rule, a government ruled by one man or by a small class, self-appointed and self-perpetuated. Our problem today in America is to protect and preserve our American way against these insidious attacks and undermining by this European concept. An attack upon us may indeed never come by force of arms, but we are already experiencing an assault upon our American ideals, morale, and institutions from within. Our greatest task as Americans is to meet this attack and effectively stamp out this infiltration of totalitarian ideologies seeking to pollute and destroy our American way of life.

We in America today are in the midst of a great "war of the nerves." Rumor, gossip, opinions, propaganda, and every factor that sways human emotions are tearing into the structure of the individual and creating suspicion and hatred among a normally happy and contented people. This onslaught is designed to undermine and tear down the foundations of the American structure of free government operated by free men which we have been building in America for more than 150 years.

We may be far removed from the spitting of machine guns, the roar of the tank, and the clashing of arms—but we are close, very, very close to the influences of distorted opinion wearing away at the structure of American tolerance and democracy. We find too few people who have taken sufficient time to comprehend clearly that after all, this is America and our job in this crisis is to save America, preserve our American ideals and keep America clear of involvement in the feuds and wars of the Old World. This is the challenge confronting the Congress. With your help, God willing, we must and will prevail.

We can preserve and maintain our own ideals of government and escape the fate the Old World is experiencing today for a thousand years to come if we will complete our military defenses as planned and chart our course to avoid our entanglement in the feuds, power politics, and wars of Europe and Asia, and bar from our shores their emissaries preaching the gospel of intolerance, unrest, and disloyalty. The Monroe Doctrine decrees that the Old World keep hands off of the Western Hemisphere. Likewise it bars American interference in the internal affairs of Europe and Asia.

Totalitarian governments centralize all power in one head. In our own America there has been a marked trend along this road in the centralization of power in the Nation's Capital, which has been proceeding for several years. It is evidenced by the gradual absorption by the executive department of the Federal Government of governmental activities which formerly were performed by local communities or the individual States of the Union. The huge bureaucracies under the control of the Executive and centered in Washington have reached out into every activity of our Government. It is also evidenced by the Executive control over the legislative branch of the Government, relegating the Congress to a mere rubber stamp giving mere formal approval to the plans formulated by the Executive. This trend was further shown by the attempt to bring the judiciary under the control and domination of the Executive. If these plans are allowed to mature, we will be a long way down the road leading to a totalitarian government. This totalitarian concept of one-man rule has been pressed to the front by the renomination in Chicago of a President for a third term. One of the foundation stones of the American Republic was the repudiation of the idea of the divine right of the King to rule; the hereditary right of the ruler to perpetuate himself in power. The framers of the Constitution sought to draft a constitution which would banish one-man rule and curb the power of the representatives of the people to jeopardize the fundamental liberties retained by the people themselves. They therefore established checks and balances against the several departments of government, lodging different and specific powers in each, freed from the control of the others, and limiting the functions of the Executive to certain delegated powers.

One problem facing the framers of the Constitution was the limitation to be placed on the tenure of the office of the Chief Executive. After a provision limiting the tenure to one term of 7 years was adopted and later reconsidered, the term of office of the Executive was fixed at 4 years, with no designated prohibition against reelection. Jefferson confessed to Washington that the "perpetual reeligibility of the President" might make for life or even for hereditary tenure and deplored the failure to place a limitation upon the term of the office. However, this defect in the Constitution was overcome by Washington, Jefferson, and Monroe refusing to accept a third term and establishing an unwritten law that there should be no third term. This precedent, established by the Father of our Country, the founder of the Democratic Party, and the author of the Monroe Doctrine, has never been broken for a hundred and fifty years. No political party since that time has felt justified in overriding this precedent, which now amounts to law, until our present Chief Executive forced his renomination at the recent Democratic convention. Jefferson, on being urged to run for a third term, said:

"But that I should lay down my charge at a proper period is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully.

"If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will in fact become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance.

"Believing that a representative government responsible at short periods of election is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office."

Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party, further said:

"Should a President consent to be a candidate for a third election, I trust he would be rejected on this demonstration of ambitious views."

The underlying reason against a third term is that a President having served for 8 years and having under his control the vast power now resident in the Chief Executive of the Nation, is in a position, should he desire to use his power, to compel his renomination. As Jefferson said, this may make the office nominally for years, one for life and, as history shows, might degenerate into an inheritance. This procedure is un-American and clearly opposed to the American concept of a democratic government. It is an attribute of a totalitarian rule or dictatorship. This very thing did happen in Chicago, when the Chief Executive, through his domination and control of the convention by the exercise of the great powers of his office, not only forced his own renomination for a third term but also named the Vice Presidential nominee.

The Democratic Party, in its 1896 national platform, declared:

"We declare it to be the unwritten law of this Republic, established by custom and usage of 100 years, and sanctioned by the examples of the greatest and wisest of those who founded and have maintained our Government, that no man shall be eligible for a third term of the Presidential office."

The Senate of the United States, on February 10, 1928, adopted the following resolution:

"That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the Presidential office after their second term has become by universal concurrence a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

The resolution was passed by a vote of 56 to 26. Among others voting for it were Senators CAPPER, HARRISON, NORRIS, ASHURST, BARKLEY, BLACK, GLASS, KING, PITTMAN, THOMAS, TYDINGS, WHEELER, and WAGNER.

CONCLUSION

The Government belongs to the people. It is slipping from their grasp. Our task—yours and mine—is to help the people of America recapture their government. Our democracy is on trial. Our American way of life is confronted with a real challenge. It is nonpartisan. We must be imbued with the spirit of sacrifice if we are to meet it. We must not forget that our founding fathers in penning the Declaration of Independence, which chartered our liberties, cried out against the iniquities of one-man rule with the indictment: He has obstructed the administration of justice; he has made judges dependent upon his will for the tenure of their office; he has erected a multitude of new offices and sent swarms of officers to harass our people and to eat out their substance; he has kept among us in times of peace standing armies. As a result they declared their independence, severing the political bonds which bound them to the mother country. They were not unmindful, however, of the price they must pay for their liberties, and they declared as the concluding article in the Declaration of Independence:

"And for the support of this declaration, with firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

We of today who have come into this precious heritage, the liberties of free men, can do no less than did these immortal founders of our Nation—pledge our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor to preserve our America for ourselves and those who will follow us in the years that lie ahead.

My Report to the People of Thurston County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my established practice, I hereby render my report and account of my official record to the citizens of Thurston County.

I agree with the many thousands of citizens who have written to me that our first task remains that of keeping our country out of war. I shall continue my vigorous support of neutrality legislation. We are the only neutral nation in the world whose ships and citizens have not been attacked.

I shall cooperate vigorously in supporting President Roosevelt's national-defense program and am remaining at my post of duty in order to do so.

May I take this opportunity to sincerely thank my fellow citizens for their kind expressions of approval of my work in Congress. Their generous letters have been a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Influence in Congress depends upon seniority of service on important committees. Why throw away the influence of seniority and experience? What do candidates have to offer except their own personal ambition? I now rank sixth out of a membership of 27 on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, having started at the bottom of the ladder in 1933. As a direct result, we have had more regular worthy river and harbor, jetty, and flood-control projects approved and carried out in southwest Washington during my period of service than during the entire previous history of our State. It is also my privilege to be chairman of the Pensions Committee, which gives me added rank and prestige in the House. I also am serving on the important Committee on Education, vital to the students and faculties in our public schools and colleges, and on the Indian Affairs and War Claims Committees.

When politicians are desperate, they sometimes resort to issues of the most trivial and amusing nature, and this year for the first time the Congressman's county of legal residence is seemingly being made such an issue.

I have been a permanent resident of southwest Washington for 30 years and have been continuously visiting all the communities in the district, and am, therefore, thoroughly familiar with conditions and problems in every community. However, length of residence in the district is important, for a comparative newcomer from a distant part of the State could not be expected to know our people nor our problems and would consequently not be qualified to represent our interests effectively.

The particular city or county in which the Congressman resides has absolutely no bearing on his effectiveness to serve his district, which depends on his length of service, his rank, and his experience.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, who is retiring after 24 years in Congress, paid a tribute the other day to the seasoned Members of the House.

The rest of the States, he said, should follow the example of Texas in reelecting its Congressmen, then they would control more committee chairmanships. Texas, with 21 Members in the House, today holds five chairmanships, he pointed out. It is exceeded only by New York with 6 out of its 45 Members holding committee chairmanships. The Texas Congressman ended by quoting former Speaker Champ Clark:

A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

IMPROVED BUSINESS CONDITIONS

The steady improvement in business conditions and recovery from the depths of 1929–33 continue.

I shall never forget the gloom and despair of the merchants, laborers and farmers in 1932 when I visited Olympia, Tumwater, Tenino, Rochester, Bucoda, Grand Mound, Little Rock, Gate, and all the other communities in Thurston County. There were hardly any jobs or money in circulation—prices were down and there was no market. Conditions are vastly different now and we are far better situated than we were then.

GOVERNMENT AID AND COOPERATION

Not only has this beneficial change been wrought but our Government has also aided and cooperated in the construction of many worth-while projects which make our local communities better places in which to live.

OLYMPIA HARBOR

During my service in Congress and as a member of the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, we have had more dredging and improvements accomplished in Olympia Harbor than during the entire previous history of the port, which fact will be verified by the efficient port manager, Mr. E. C. Gribble, and the port commissioners. I have had no less than four separate projects approved by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for deepening of the channel, providing turning basins, and so forth. We have now pending and awaiting authorization and allocation of funds a new project to cost $80,000. As a direct consequence of this cooperation and our successful efforts, the port of Olympia has become one of the outstanding commercial ports in the Pacific Northwest, and the facilities provided have caused a steady growth and increase in employment, trade, and cargo tonnage. These harbor improvements are a substantial and direct benefit to the industries and workers of Olympia.

In 1939 the port of Olympia enjoyed the most prosperous year in its history, the total revenue surpassing any previous year by 41 percent. Lumber loadings were the largest in 10 years. General cargoes were 50 percent greater than those of the previous record year of 1938. There were 293 ships berthed at the port.

COOPERATION REGARDING THURSTON COUNTY PRODUCTS

It has been my privilege to cooperate vigorously in behalf of the use of rock and stone from the Skookumchuck Quarry on the Grays Harbor Jetties, which has provided much employment for local citizens. Also, I have cooperated constantly with Mr. Andrew Wilson in behalf of Tenino sandstone on contracts on Federal buildings.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

During the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, there was expended by the Federal Government in Thurston County the sum of $6,563,028, and loaned therein the additional sum of $1,332,934, a total of $7,895,962.

Flood control, school, airport, dock, armory, irrigation, drainage, road, street, sidewalk, water system, recreation field, park, sanitation projects have been provided and will constitute valuable community assets for many years to come and serve future generations as well as our own.

MY PROGRESSIVE LABOR RECORD

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress, I have supported and voted for every piece of legislation of benefit to labor. I realize that our business prosperity is measured by the income and wages received by labor and agriculture. I have therefore supported their reasonable demands 100 percent. We have conferred upon labor the same right as that enjoyed by their employers, namely, to bargain collectively in regard to wages, working hours, and working conditions. I have had the active support of every branch of organized labor and the railroad brotherhoods ever since I have been a Member of Congress and intend to continue to merit and deserve their support in the future as I have in the past. I have likewise heartily supported all legislation designed to accord to our Federal and postal workers more liberal treatment. They serve the public faithfully and efficiently and should be treated accordingly.

WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

For 4 years I served as a member of the steering committee of 22 House Members, which led the successful fight for the soldiers' bonus. Instead of paying our veterans in bullets, tear bombs, and poison gas, the way the bonus army was "paid," we paid in cash in 1936 the bonus which had been delinquent since 1924. Veterans in Thurston County thus received $683,389.10.

I have sponsored two bills familiar to every Spanish War veteran, the Smith bill of 1935, paying their pensions in full, and the Philippine travel-pay bill of 1940, as well as numerous other measures for hospitalization, increased benefits, and so forth.

I have favored every bill in the interests of the veterans of the World War, their widows and dependents, which has come before Congress, and am nationally known for my active support of veterans' legislation. I shall continue this policy, for it is my firm belief that it is the solemn duty and sacred obligation of our Government never to forget but always to remember and to compensate to the fullest possible extent those who have defended our Republic. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have always received from the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United Spanish War Veterans, the Disabled American Veterans, and their auxiliaries.

FEDERAL HOUSING—HOME OWNERS' LOANS—BANK AND SAVINGS AND LOAN DEPOSITS

As one of the five Members of the House who conferred with President Roosevelt March 20, 1934, and sponsored the first housing legislation in Congress, I am gratified at the benefits which have accrued therefrom to our people. In Thurston County 313 citizens have received loans aggregating $1,006,500 for the construction, modernization, and repair of their homes. This has been of vast benefit to the workers in the building trades, including painters, electricians, and plumbers, and the lumber, plywood, shingle, and other allied industries.

I actively supported the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act and am glad that 368 citizens in Thurston County have received loans aggregating $602,378.45. I expressed my belief in this legislation on April 28, 1933, in these words:

> Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to render available the sum of $2,000,000,000 to restore, redeem, rehabilitate, and save the homes of many of the American people, and, Mr. Speaker, when we save the homes of the American people, we save America.

Depositors in the two banks in Thurston County have their deposits up to $5,000 insured by the Federal Government under the acts of Congress which I heartily supported and voted for. The 11,919 depositors in three savings and loan associations likewise have their deposits insured under the same legislation. I am happy and proud that the Roosevelt administration has provided this protection and security for our people and that it has been my privilege to have a humble part in bringing about these great reforms which should have been introduced many years ago.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

As an active Member of the House Committee on Education, I have vigorously favored providing in public works and relief appropriation bills adequate funds to aid in paying the salaries of school teachers and maintain, repair, and improve our public-school buildings, as well as institutions of higher learning, as I consider the cause of public education and the recommendations of our parent-teacher associations to be paramount.

I favor the following program:

First. Adequate free public education for the children of the United States.

Second. Adequate pay for public-school teachers as a matter of justice and as a means of retaining in and attracting to the teaching profession the most competent, devoted, and best-equipped men and women.

Third. An annual minimum of at least 8 months teaching in the public schools of all the States.

Fourth. An adequate number of safe, commodious, and well-equipped school buildings.

Fifth. Free textbooks for all public-school pupils.

Sixth. Adequate assistance by the Federal Government through appropriations and otherwise, in accomplishing the foregoing objects.

Seventh. Such of the allied purposes as may serve the best interests of the teachers and pupils and the parent-teacher associations in making the public schools a more effective, far-reaching, and American force in local, State, and National life.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

I have been an ardent, outspoken advocate of old-age pensions during my service in Congress. I have continued the interest which, as a veteran member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, I have manifested for the past 25 years. I have on every occasion promptly signed every petition to bring old-age pension and general welfare legislation before the Congress for action.

I was the first Member of Congress to publicly espouse the Townsend plan in 1934, and in a brief 6 years have, as a member of our steering committee, actively participated in the growth of our movement until today we are approximating a sufficient following in the House of Representatives to enact our legislation in its present form into law. The United States Senate recently, for the first time, authorized a thorough study of the Townsend plan. In view of this progress, we confidently expect to reelect enough of our old supporters and elect a sufficient number of new supporters in the elections this year to enact H. R. 8264 into law in the next Congress.

FARM LEGISLATION

The farm problem is recognized as the most difficult with which we have to deal, having been acute since 1920. We have done more for the farmer than any previous national administration, and have since 1932 doubled our farm income. We have recaptured our lost foreign export trade in agricultural products, without sacrificing our home markets, and should you desire the official Government statistics bearing on this entire subject, please write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., or write to me, and I shall be glad to obtain them for you. Self-seeking politicians running for office do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the facts. Therefore, if you are interested in ascertaining the true facts I shall be glad to assist you in doing so. We have not entirely solved the farm problem, but we have made more progress toward a solution than any previous national administration.

The condition of the farmer everywhere is much better than it was in 1932, when his prices and market were the worst in the history of American agriculture. Think back to 1932 and compare the lot of the average farmer in your own neighborhood as it was then with his condition today in 1940, and you will realize this fact. We intend to keep on helping the farmer. It remains my opinion that the Grange cost-of-production plan, to insure the farmer parity prices with industry, offers the best solution of the farm problem. In the next Congress I shall again vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture, and would be glad to have you verify this fact by writing to Mr. Ervin E. King, master of the Washington State Grange, 3104 Western Avenue, Seattle, Wash., or Mr. Fred Brenckman, legislative representative, National Grange, 1343 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

BONNEVILLE—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

I am proud of my sponsorship of the $70,000,000 Bonneville Project and rural electrification projects, and shall exert every effort to bring their benefits to all our citizens.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES

One of the most important enterprises which can be encouraged by the Federal Government is the developing, propagating, and conserving of our fish and game resources. I have, therefore, at all times cooperated with the House Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources and the various pogy, wildlife, sportsmen's, game, and rod and gun clubs and associations in southwest Washington. I voted for the Robertson-Pittman Act last year and the appropriation this year of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. The Federal contribution to our State is estimated at $60,575, to be matched by the State contributing $20,191.66, a total of $80,766.66. I have actively cooperated in obtaining W. P. A. and Federal funds for fish hatcheries, fishponds, and fish and game preserves and wildlife projects in southwest Washington.

I have given prompt attention to the requests received from the holders of fish and game licenses in southwest Washington for information regarding the Federal laws and pending legislation relating to the subject of wildlife.

LUMBER, SHINGLES, PULP, PLYWOOD INDUSTRIES

During my entire service in Congress on every occasion, without a single exception, I have supported and voted for beneficial legislation desired by the lumber, shingle, pulp, and plywood industries and advantageous to their workers, and have at all times extended to them my whole-hearted cooperation. Self-seeking politicians apparently have no scruples in misrepresenting the facts. Therefore, if you wish to verify my statement in regard to my official record, I would suggest that you write to the official legislative representatives of the organizations to which our local industries belong: Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager, West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 364 Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., 340 White-Henry-Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; Henry Bahr, counsel, National Lumber Manufacturers Association, 1337 Connecticut Ave., Washington, D. C.; Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, Tacoma Building, Tacoma, Wash.; O. M. Porter, secretary, United States Pulp Producers Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

In the general election 2 years ago, in 1938, my Republican opponent had the nerve to display a bundle of shingles and talk about protection for shingles. At that time, and for 5 years previously, the shingle industry and workers enjoyed a 25-percent quota, the only protection in 25 years. The Republicans kept shingles on the duty-free list for 25 years without any quota, causing Senator HOMER T. BONE, in the campaign in 1932, to say, "The shingle industry was ruined because of this fact."

In the period since I took my seat in Congress in 1933 the shingle industry has been revived, old mills remodeled and equipped with new machinery, and new mills built, until now we have three times as many plants and number of shingle weavers employed as in 1932.

November 18, 1935, Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

I hasten to send you this brief note to thank you for the fine help we received from you in our fight to secure the import quota on Canadian shingles. I want to express to you my appreciation of your efforts in our behalf.

To render the quota more effective I introduced the bill which became law for a census of the shingle industry. On May 27, 1937, Mr. McGrath wrote when President Roosevelt signed my bill:

This news is about the most important that has come to red cedar shingle manufacturers and the logging and lumber operators associated with the shingle business.

February 1, 1938, the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

At the annual membership meeting of this association, held in Tacoma February 1, 1938, a resolution was unanimously approved instructing the secretary to write you expressing the gratitude of this association for your faithful services in our behalf in connection with the import limitations on red cedar shingles.

On November 2, 1938, the following news article was published in the Hoquiam Washingtonian:

SHINGLE WEAVERS COMMEND SMITH

A resolution endorsing MARTIN F. SMITH in his campaign for reelection to Congress was passed this week by Grays Harbor Shingle Weavers, Local 2576. The resolution endorsing SMITH is being sent to all shingle weavers unions in the district council. The resolution commends Congressman SMITH for diligent work in limiting importation of Canadian shingles into the United States.

In this Congress I have actively cooperated in efforts to secure aid for the workers and the shingle industry. Following vigorous efforts before the State Department and Ways and Means Committee, we have recently secured the passage of a bill providing for a duty of 25 cents per square on red cedar shingles imported from Canada, the first duty imposed in 29 years. On June 28, 1940, David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

The final passage of our shingle bill in the Senate on June 22 brings to a conclusion the long struggle to put shingles back on the duty list. To say that we are pleased expresses our feeling very mildly.

Having full knowledge of the difficulties of getting a tariff bill through Congress, and particularly one giving protection to the shingle or lumber industries, we are grateful for the continuous thought and effort you have given our affairs.

All during the struggle, since January 1, it has been heartening to know that you were tirelessly working for the passage of our shingle bill, and it has been of great value to the writer to be able to confer with you at any time when a conference was deemed necessary. You have been "on the job" for us and we are very appreciative.

With best wishes for your continued success we remain.

Yours truly,

UNITED STATES RED CEDAR SHINGLE INDUSTRY, INC.,
By DAVID M. WILLIAMS,
Secretary-Manager.

I would suggest that when the candidates of the opposing party talk about shingles that citizens ask them about the do-nothing record of their party for 25 years and the do-something record of the Roosevelt administration and request an explanation. I would appreciate citizens writing me briefly what explanation, if any, they give. I am curious, as you must be, after reading the foregoing recital of facts, to know what alibi and excuse they have to offer.

LUMBER EXCISE TAX

The lumber business is the best it has been in 10 years. Last year pay rolls and wages in private industry were the highest in the history of the State.

A candidate for Congress should have respect for the voters and for the office he is seeking. What about the candidate who deliberately circulates malicious falsehoods? Two years ago and again this year the same falsehood is being circulated and published that Members of Congress from our State, including myself, voted to reduce the excise tax on lumber. The best answer to this campaign lie was made December 12, 1938, by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager and legislative representative of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, of which our local lumber firms are members:

The west coast lumber industry has had the effective and loyal support of Mr. SMITH on every occasion when we have been asking for his help. He has voted for renewal of the excise tax on imported lumber on every occasion when the matter has been before Congress. He has supported our efforts to have lumber properly defined for taxing purposes, as in the classification of large timbers and with withdrawal of allowances for planing and milling. He has helped us in every question arising for the clarification and administration of the excise tax.

The West Coast Lumbermen's Association keeps wholly out of politics. I just want as a matter of fairness, to point out that Mr. SMITH has been a very loyal and conscientious supporter of the interests of the lumber industry since he entered Congress. I feel it only square that this fact be made known.

Sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Secretary-Manager.

My amendment of the lumber import excise tax, known as the Smith amendment, introduced as H. R. 7934, was attached to the Revenue Act in 1938 and passed the Senate, was approved by President Roosevelt and became law. It prevents deductions for tonguing, planing, and grooving of imported lumber and is estimated to increase about 25 percent the excise tax, which is the tax unscrupulous candidates for Congress falsely accuse me of voting to reduce. April 4, 1938, Henry Bahr, counsel for the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, wrote me as follows:

Regarding your amendment of the lumber import excise tax, which was tacked onto the revenue bill in the Ways and Means Committee and retained by the Senate last week, I am sure Colonel Greeley must have told you how sincerely we appreciate your helpful cooperation in this matter.

Candidates of the opposite party should be asked by the voters why their party under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930 and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922 left lumber and shingles on the duty-free list, without any import excise tax or quota limitation, and provided 100 percent free trade with Canada. Such an explanation, if made, would be interesting, probably amusing.

PULP LEGISLATION

I am the author of H. R. 7312, the Smith bill, to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921, to plug up and curtail importations of foreign pulp in competition with our local product. This bill has received wide support from the pulp and sulphite workers unions and the manufacturers. It has strong support in Congress. The United States Pulp Producers Association, O. M. Porter, has written me as follows:

I am very glad to be able to tell you that the executive committee of this association has instructed me to do everything possible toward developing Nation-wide support of your bill (H. R. 7312) to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921.

The changed conditions suddenly caused by the invasion of the Scandinavian countries and removal temporarily of competition from that quarter has deferred immediate action, but the legislation is in fine shape for consideration in the next Congress.

PEELER LOG LEGISLATION

Past national administrations have permitted the exporting of peeler logs without hindrance so many years that now this, too, has created a problem to deal with. This has nothing to do with the reciprocal-trade agreements, which have made no change whatsoever. The question is simply one of whether we should limit the export of raw materials, the supply of which is becoming limited on account of our generosity in the past, which we now need for our own domestic use and manufacture by our own labor. I have vigorously favored the enactment of this legislation, which presents difficulties because it establishes a new precedent. Past neglect always renders application of the remedy difficult. The outlook for the enactment of this legislation in the near future is favorable on account of the hearings which have been held and the efforts which have been put forth in its behalf by the entire Washington congressional delegation. On May 24, 1940, Mr. Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, with which plywood manufacturers in southwest Washington are affiliated, wrote me:

The board of directors held its annual meeting on May 21, and I was directed to express to you the board's appreciation of the valuable assistance which you have given in the peeler log matter.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION—CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The National Youth Administration has made a splendid record in the State of Washington, and many young men and women in my district have greatly benefited from the program. Through the office of Mr. John H. Binns, Washington State Administrator of the N. Y. A., I have obtained official figures on the out-of-school program and the school work program which reflect the actual earnings of the young people. However, the figures for the college work program do not take into account students living in my district but attending college elsewhere. There are, of course, a great many young men and women from southwest Washington at the University of Washington, Washington State College, and elsewhere, and they are receiving their full share of the college work funds. In Thurston County a total of 102 young men and women have participated in the out-of-school work program, receiving total monthly earnings of $1,530. Under the college work program there are 10 students attending St. Martin's College, with a total yearly quota of $1,350. Five schools of Thurston County are included in the school work program, with a total of 134 student workers, and a total yearly quota of $4,860.

The useful and constructive work performed by the young men in the C. C. C. camps has received universal praise. In my district, in addition to building trails, roads, bridges, the prevention of floods, and soil erosion, and other public improvements, their services in effectively fighting forest fires has resulted in a saving of millions of dollars. The young men themselves have benefited greatly from the training and instruction which they have received, and, of course, their own compensation, and the allotments to their dependents have provided added purchasing power. The expenditures for materials and supplies in the vicinity of the camps have been a direct benefit to numerous business firms and merchants. C. C. C. camps have been in operation in practically every county in my district and the entire State of Washington.

AMERICA FOREVER—COMMUNISM, FASCISM, NAZI-ISM NEVER

On June 22, 1940, I voted for H. R. 5138, the most thorough and far-reaching revision of our immigration and deportation laws in the past 25 years. It is directed against all subversive, "fifth column," and un-American activities, and provides punishment for those who attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. H. R. 5138, as amended, was carefully considered, and provides effective remedies against all foreign isms without violating our Constitution and American traditions.

My friends, we have the finest country and the best Government on earth. Let us keep them that way. There is no room in America for communism, fascism, nazi-ism. There is room for only one ism, and that is Americanism. We are going to keep America out of Europe, and we are going to keep Europe out of America.

Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 5, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR CAPPER, OF KANSAS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by me over the National Broadcasting System on the night of July 30 in opposition to military conscription in peacetime.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that before the United States adopts compulsory military service in peacetime we should first give the traditional voluntary-enlistment plan a fair trial.

Those urging compulsory military training for the young men of the Nation assert that the voluntary-enlistment plan has failed, but they produce no evidence to show that voluntary enlistment has failed. The Adjutant General of the Army and General Marshall, Chief of Staff, tell us that the recruiting service of the Army has filled every quota set by the Army and that in June and July the quotas were obtained before the end of the month.

I am convinced that if the term of enlistment is reduced from 3 years to 1 year and if the base pay is increased from $21 to $30 a month all the men needed will enlist. I say we should give this democratic plan a fair trial before adopting the Hitler system of military conscription in the United States.

I send to the desk a copy of my radio broadcast to be printed in the Appendix.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOR 1-YEAR VOLUNTARY ENLISTMENT IN PEACETIME

Friends in the radio audience, I am opposed emphatically to the conscription of our young men into military service in peacetime.

Therefore I shall oppose to the limit of my strength and ability the Burke-Wadsworth bill, which would set up the first peacetime conscription program in the history of the United States. I am for 1-year voluntary enlistment in peacetime.

I shall oppose conscription without rancor, without hysteria, and without casting any doubts upon the purposes of those sponsoring this legislation. I know that those supporting, as well as those opposing, conscription in peacetime are sincerely and patriotically interested in national defense, as I am.

No doubt those favoring this legislation believe honestly that such a program is essential to safeguard our country against the fate which has befallen France and other European nations in the past few months. I might note in passing, however, that France had conscription of manpower, so it was not failure or neglect to conscript its youth into the army that caused France's downfall.

I sincerely believe, and many others have the same belief, that America can be adequately defended and our interests safeguarded, without resorting to conscription of manpower, without compulsory military training.

The proposed conscription bill seems to have the approval of the Army high command, and that is not to be wondered at. It will enable the Army to reach into every county in the United States and get the pick of the young men and boys to work with.

But the people of my State, including all classes, are opposed to conscription in peacetime as a matter of principle and as leading directly to the destruction of their personal liberties. They believe and I believe that conscription will prove to be still another step in the program to lead us into the European war. I am against that.

Now, I am for an adequate national defense. I want an Army, Navy, and air force large enough, well enough equipped, well enough trained to fight off any aggression that might be attempted against us. But I do not believe we want the Hitler system of organizing this Nation for war. And certainly there is no reason why the pending bill should be rushed through Congress without fair and full consideration.

The people of this country want the United States to remain a democracy. I want the United States to remain a democracy. I do not believe that conscription of the youth of the Nation in peacetime can be labeled a democratic process by any stretch of the imagination.

The Burke-Wadsworth bill provides for the registration of all males between the ages of 18 and 64. It empowers the President, in peacetime, at his own discretion, subject only to necessary appropriations by Congress, to draft into the military service such men as are considered needed between the ages of 21 and 45; to draft those between 18 and 21, and between 45 and 64, for home-defense purposes.

Army spokesmen appearing before Senate and House committees inform us that it is only intended to draft for military training a million men a year from those without dependents, and not needed in industry for national-defense purposes, between the ages of 21 to 31. However, the bill provides specifically for drafting also a percentage from the 31–45 group. The Army informs us also that the drafting machinery already has been set up in all the 48 States, ready to start grinding as soon as Congress enacts the legislation.

Under this proposal at least a million of our young men will be drafted into the military service every year for a year's training.

Back of this bill, which has a life of 5 years, but is pushed as designed only to meet an existing emergency, there is a drive to make universal military training for all our youth permanently a part of our governmental system. I am against that program. It is un-American and unnecessary. I am for the American way of organizing our defense forces, not the Hitler way.

My friends, I would be willing to vote for conscription of manpower for national defense if and when this Nation goes to war to defend our own national interests.

But conscription in peacetime is another thing. I will admit that when the United States finds it necessary to engage in modern war, the only fair and equitable and efficient way to raise the Army is through the selective service.

And right at this point I wish to interject another thought. If ever we go to war, and it becomes necessary to draft men, I say we also should draft wealth. I am opposed, even in wartime, to drafting men without also drafting war profits. I am opposed to any program which creates several thousand war millionaires.

It is generally recognized that under present conditions, with a good part of the world war mad and the dictators of Europe on the march of pillage and destruction, the United States is not adequately prepared to defend itself against all the forces that might conceivably be thrown against us.

A gigantic rearmament program is under way. Billions of dollars are being expended for warships, airplanes, tanks, other equipment, and munitions and war supplies.

I think all of us realize that the mere appropriation and expenditure of $15,000,000,000 or more is not all that is necessary to build an adequate national defense. Trained men and tried leadership must be provided.

But the fact that men are needed for our armed forces does not of itself prove that conscription is necessary.

If we can obtain the necessary men in the traditional and democratic way of voluntary enlistments—and I believe we can—I say that would be highly preferable to conscription.

There is no showing as yet that the Army cannot be recruited to necessary strength, even to a million or more men, through voluntary enlistments, for 1 year. That is the plan I am supporting and I hope Congress will approve it. General Marshall, Chief of Staff of the Army, told the Senate Committee on Military Affairs that so far enlistments have run ahead of the quotas set by the Army itself. The June quota was 15,000—that quota was reached 10 days before the end of the month.

"In other words," said General Marshall, "recruiting went ahead in good shape."

And at that, it is worth noting that those who enlist now in the Army must enlist for a full 3-year period, at a base pay of $21 a month. Young men can enlist in the Civilian Conservation Corps for 1 year and draw $30 a month.

It seems to me that it might be well worth while to allow Army enlistment for 1 year or one 18-month period, pay $30 a month, and see if the response will not be more than enough to get a million men for the first year's training.

Instead of taking it for granted, without any attempt at proof, that an army for training purposes cannot be raised by voluntary enlistment, why not make a real effort to recruit the Army through voluntary enlistments for 1 year before taking the Hitler way of conscripting our boys and young men for military service?

That seems to me to be good common sense.

There is another danger in this hurried attempt to force through conscription and build up a huge army—perhaps larger than is needed for even Western Hemisphere defense.

That danger was pointed out by Maj. George Fielding Eliot in the Herald Tribune last Sunday. Writing of this mass mobilization of man power proposed, Major Eliot said:

"There may be other ways of improving the national morale besides spending more than is necessary on an army which, if it passes the size needed for hemisphere missions, may well become an instrument useful only for overseas adventures—perhaps for a ghastly holocaust in Europe in case the British-German duel fights itself down to a standstill.

"Remember there is no certainty," Major Eliot continued, "either that Britain can stand off Germany or that Germany can successfully invade Britain. But if Britain makes a successful defense of her islands—as we all hope—she can hardly take the offensive against Germany thereafter, for lack of manpower. We should be quite clear on one point—that we do not propose to provide the manpower for any invasion of the European continent. It will be much better not to create any instrument of war which can be useful for that purpose alone." I say we must keep out of Europe's war.

I tell you, my friends, this Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill should be given careful attention by the Congress, and by the country, before it reaches the stage of a final vote.

Is the purpose back of this measure merely to provide an army for adequate defense—which all of us want, and for which any needed sacrifice will be made cheerfully and willingly—or is it for the purpose of training a larger army that will be available for service overseas? Is Congress being asked to pass a draft law to provide the men for another American expeditionary force to fight in Europe's wars? I certainly am against that.

These are legitimate questions. Those sponsoring this measure should be required to show (1) that the number of men intended to be trained is necessary for national defense; (2) that the required number cannot be recruited by voluntary enlistments.

And I believe they should make it plain that all they want is an Army, Navy, and air force designed for national defense—not an oversized Army for overseas service. It would be criminal to take us into a foreign war at this time.

I say we should consider this whole proposition as calmly as the present disturbed state of the world will permit.

It seems to me the fundamental questions involved are these:

Has it become necessary for the United States to abandon its traditional American policy of 150 years and raise a conscript Army in peacetime?

Has it become necessary for the United States to declare that the individual is only a pawn in the hands of the State, without personal choice?

Has it become necessary to abandon—aye, to destroy—personal freedom of our young men and adopt the Hitler policies of militaristic continental Europe and use autocratic military conscription?

I say it is up to the proponents of this conscription bill to show that the answers to these questions are all "Yes." As for me, I do not believe it.

I, for one, will not vote for conscription for military service unless and until it is proved to me beyond all reasonable doubt that there is no other way of building up an adequate national defense.

And I am convinced that this cannot be proved.

Furthermore, as I have stated many times on the floor of the Senate, I will never vote to send American boys across the seas to fight in other people's wars.

I shall continue to do everything in my power to keep this country out of foreign wars. It would be criminal to take the United States into Europe's war at this time.

Revision of National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS OF UTAH

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], published in the Washington Daily News of August 3, 1940, under the auspices of the American Forum, on the question: Should the Wagner Labor Act be drastically revised?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN FORUM—SHOULD THE WAGNER LABOR ACT BE DRASTICALLY REVISED?—THE QUESTION

(By Theodore Granik, director, the American Forum)

One vital difference between the Republican and Democratic platforms adopted for the 1940 campaign is the stand of the opposing parties on the National Labor Relations (Wagner) Act.

The Republican position is that the act should "be amended in fairness to employers and all groups of employees so as to provide true freedom for, and orderliness in, self-organization and collective bargaining." The Democratic pledge "to maintain the principles" of the act, and "to strengthen the orderly processes of collective bargaining and peaceful settlement of labor disputes."

The point of cleavage is the issue of amending the law, which has been the subject of bitter controversy. Hailed by labor as a new Magna Carta, the Wagner Act has been denounced by various organizations as one-sided and discriminatory.

Last year both the House and Senate Labor Committees held extensive hearings, and this year a special committee headed by Representative HOWARD W. SMITH, Virginia Democrat, made an inquiry into the operations of the act and the personnel of the Labor Board. The Republican labor plank is written on the basis of the disclosures of the Smith committee.

To present both sides of this important campaign issue, the American Forum has secured authoritative articles from congressional leaders of the opposing viewpoints. They are written exclusively for this page.

"NO," SAYS SENATOR THOMAS

(By ELBERT D. THOMAS, United States Senator from Utah, chairman, Committee on Education and Labor)

No one would be opposed to any constructive amendment to any act, for all persons realize that no act is perfect. Therefore, when I answer "No" to the question submitted, I mean that I am opposed to any amendment which would destroy the effectiveness, or the purpose, or the basically democratic principles behind the National Labor Relations Act in its attempt to make collective bargaining function properly.

Those of us who took part in the framing of the National Labor Relations Act realized that we were bringing into existence a great habit-forming institution. We assumed that the principle of collective bargaining was a correct principle. We assumed that all steps toward bringing about the selection of the collective bargainers must be steps consistent with the basic principles of free action, of free elections uncoerced and uninfluenced.

Especially should those steps be free in the sense that no person either representing or secretly acting for the employer could be able to use persuasion, economic pressure, or threat of losing a job upon anyone who should appear at the polls or who should take part in any of the preliminaries expected to result in an election. In other words, the framers of the act, in order to assure honest bargaining, took a firm stand against the company-dominated union.

EXPERIMENT NOT YET TESTED

Therefore the first reason why I would stand against any amendment which was not a corrective or constructive amendment would be that the time element, which is necessary to insure a real test of any habit-forming legislation such as the National Labor Relations Act, has not been sufficient to give that test.

The next reason I would oppose amendments at this time is that through the enforcement of the act the regulations have been changed from time to time; court reviews, in fact, have made some of these changes necessary, so that the act as yet has not reached the position in time or in practice which could be called stable.

The National Labor Relations Act was a great experiment in an attempt to do a democratic thing in a democratic way and to give to the workers of this Nation a right to speak honestly for themselves when their welfare demanded that they should. The experiment has gone far enough for us to know that it has justified itself.

It has not gone far enough for us to call the experiment perfect. But there are hundreds of thousands of workers in America who realize that they have attained a new freedom, a freedom that gives them a sense of security, a freedom that causes them to know that in America there is an economic democracy as well as a political democracy. This new great freedom will add to the stability of our industrial organizations manyfold.

GROWTH OF ECONOMIC DEMOCRACY

It will be discovered as time goes on that the interests of the workers will increase, that their appreciation of their employer's position and needs will grow. The people of our country, watching this growth, will note that just as political democracy tends toward stability, just so will economic democracy tend toward stability.

It is interesting to point out that those who fear a growth of industrial democracy are like those among our founding fathers who feared the growth of political democracy. The more the people have to do with things the more stable in all things will our land become. Let wealth and power be gathered in one place and the people are divided; let wealth and power be scattered and the people will become united.

It was a glorious sight to watch 135,000 employees of one of our great corporations go to the ballot booths and vote for bargainers, in much the same way as they vote as citizens of the United States in selecting their Representatives in Congress or their Governors or their President.

Think of it. One corporation alone on the same day having 135,000 of its employees freely expressing themselves about who should represent them. More ballots cast in one industry than are cast in some of the States of the Union at a general election.

This is a magnificent spectacle when viewed from the standpoint of the growth and development of democracy. I know that some of those who are demanding amendments will say that they do not want to interfere with this splendid spectacle, but that they just want to make it better. How can we make an institution better by amending the process before time has proved the worthwhileness of its great fundamentals?

LABOR SELF-DISCIPLINING

The dream that every thoughtful person has for industrial America is that labor shall take on the privileges of citizenship in industrial America; that labor shall become self-disciplining; that labor shall reprimand its own leadership when its leadership is at fault or corrupt; that labor shall be free to select its own leaders. Therein is the key of good leadership.

Throughout history those in society who have had the privileged positions have always been suspicious of extending the privileges of those positions to others. Whenever a freedom has been obtained, those of the privileged group have always been afraid that such freedom would be abused.

Let us give labor a chance to use its freedom, assert its freedom, and let us have faith that labor itself will correct its own abuses. The American laboring man is considered competent to vote for his Governor, to vote for his President. If he can be trusted to vote right politically, where the stake is great, we may rest assured that he can be trusted to vote right economically, where the stake is the lesser.

Just as laboring men strike down dishonest and corrupt leaders politically, so they will, if given a chance and if their elections are kept free, strike down a corrupt labor leader. Let us let democracy function.

My Report to the People of Pacific County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN F. SMITH
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my established practice, I hereby render my report and account of my official record to the citizens of Pacific County.

I agree with the many thousands of citizens who have written to me that our first task remains that of keeping our country out of war. I shall continue my vigorous support of neutrality legislation. We are the only neutral nation in the world whose ships and citizens have not been attacked.

I shall cooperate vigorously in supporting President Roosevelt's national-defense program, and am remaining at my post of duty in order to do so.

May I take this opportunity to sincerely thank my fellow citizens for their kind expressions of approval of my work in Congress—their generous letters have been a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Influence in Congress depends upon seniority of service on important committees. Why throw away the influence of seniority and experience? What do candidates have to offer except their own personal ambition? I now rank sixth out of a membership of 27 on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, having started at the bottom of the ladder in 1933. As a direct result, we have had more regular worthy river and harbor, jetty and flood-control projects approved and carried out in southwest Washington during my period of service than during the entire previous history of our State. It is also my privilege to be chairman of the Pensions Committee, which gives me added rank and prestige in the House. I also am serving on the important Committee on Education, vital to the students and faculties in our public schools and colleges, and on the Indian Affairs and War Claims Committees.

When politicians are desperate they sometimes resort to issues of the most trivial and amusing nature, and this year for the first time the Congressman's county of legal residence is seemingly being made such an issue.

I have been a permanent resident of southwest Washington for 30 years, and have been continuously visiting all the communities in the district and am, therefore, thoroughly familiar with conditions and problems in every community. However, length of residence in the district is important, for a comparative newcomer from a distant part of the State could not be expected to know our people nor our problems, and would consequently not be qualified to represent our interests effectively.

The particular city or county in which the Congressman resides has absolutely no bearing on his effectiveness to serve his district, which depends on his length of service, his rank, and his experience.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, who is retiring after 24 years in Congress, paid a tribute the other day to the seasoned Members of the House.

The rest of the States, he said, should follow the example of Texas in reelecting its Congressmen, then they would control more committee chairmanships. Texas, with 21 Members in the House, today holds 5 chairmanships, he pointed out. It is exceeded only by New York, with 6 out of its 45 members holding committee chairmanships. The Texas Congressman ended by quoting former Speaker Champ Clark:

> A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

IMPROVED BUSINESS CONDITIONS

The steady improvement in business conditions and recovery from the depths of 1929–33 continue.

I shall never forget the gloom and despair of the merchants, laborers, farmers, and citizens generally in 1932 when I visited Raymond, South Bend, Naselle, Ilwaco, Long Beach, Seaview, Chinook, Ocean Park, and all the communities of Pacific County. There were hardly any jobs or money in circulation—prices were down, and there was no market. Conditions are vastly different now, and we are far better situated than we were then.

GOVERNMENT AID AND COOPERATION

Not only has this beneficial change been wrought, but our Government has also aided and cooperated in the construction of many worth-while projects which make our local communities better places in which to live.

RAYMOND POST OFFICE

For many years the progressive citizens of Raymond have sought a new post-office building. On April 18, 1935, I introduced the first bill in Congress and finally in 1939 secured the first allocation of $80,000 and later an additional $20,000, making approximately $100,000 for the building and site. The building is now in course of construction and, when completed, the citizens and patrons of the Raymond post office will have one of the finest and most commodious buildings in any community of like population in the State of Washington. I am pressing vigorously my bill for a new post-office building for South Bend and feel sure that my efforts will be successful as they were in the case of Raymond.

WILLAPA HARBOR—NARROWS PROJECT

During the period of my service in Congress and as a member of the powerful Committee on Rivers and Harbors, we have had more dredging and new improvements on Willapa Harbor than during the entire previous history of the port, which can be verified by the efficient port manager and engineer, Maj. L. D. Williams, Jr., and the port commissioners. As a direct consequence of this cooperation and our successful efforts, the facilities provided have caused a steady growth and increase in employment, trade, and cargo tonnage. These harbor improvements are a substantial and direct benefit to the industries and workers of Willapa Harbor.

For 10 years prior to my election to Congress, the industries and citizens desired improvement and straightening of the Narrows. We have succeeded in having this project approved and the actual work done by the Federal Government at a cost of $200,000. I recently had approved the new Bay Center Channel dredging project at a cost of $30,000, and the funds will be provided and actual work done in due course.

BAKER BAY, CHINOOK BREAKWATER, WEST CHANNEL

We have had the Baker Bay project, so important to Ilwaco, Long Beach, and Seaview, at a cost of $56,000, carried out; also the Chinook Breakwater, costing $25,000.

After 3 years of steady, up-hill effort, we have finally obtained adoption, after several rebuffs, of the West Channel project, estimated cost $170,000, which will be carried out as soon as the necessary authorization is made and the funds are available. The North Jetty on the Columbia River, costing $1,170,000, was completed in August 1937. On account of its importance to Pacific County, this project received my active and vigorous support before the Rivers and Harbors Committee and in Congress from the time it was first proposed until it was completed.

NEW ILWACO HOSPITAL

I consider the new Ilwaco Hospital, to which the P. W. A. allotted $7,650, one of the most useful and necessary projects in Pacific County. I cooperated actively with the board of county commissioners, local citizens, and all interested parties in securing Federal aid and making possible this worthy enterprise. Under the efficient supervision of Dr. D. M. Strang and his staff of nurses, and with the most modern equipment, this hospital will benefit the health and prolong the lives of many citizens.

AIRPLANE AND SEAPLANE BASE

I have introduced a bill to authorize an appropriation of $1,000,000 for an airplane and seaplane base on Willapa Harbor as a companion measure to a similar bill for Grays Harbor, aeronautical experts to decide which site is preferable. The proposal will be studied and considered as a part of the national-defense program.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

During the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, there was expended by the Federal Government in Pacific County the sum of $2,079,902, and loaned therein the additional sum of $656,262, a total of $2,736,164.

Flood control, drainage, school, road, street, water system, hospital, sanitation, recreation projects have been provided and will constitute valuable community assets for many years to come and serve future generations as well as our own.

MY PROGRESSIVE LABOR RECORD

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress, I have supported and voted for every piece of legislation of benefit to labor. I realize that our business prosperity is measured by the income and wages received by labor and agriculture. I have, therefore, supported their reasonable demands 100 percent. We have conferred upon labor the same right as that enjoyed by their employers; that is, to bargain collectively in regard to wages, working hours, and working conditions. I have had the active support of every branch of organized labor and the railroad brotherhoods ever since I have been a Member of Congress and intend to continue to merit and deserve their support in the future as I have in the past. I have likewise heartily supported all legislation designed to accord to our Federal and postal workers more liberal treatment. They serve the public faithfully and efficiently and should be treated accordingly.

WAR VETERANS LEGISLATION

For 4 years I served as a member of the steering committee of 22 House Members, which led the successful fight for the soldiers' bonus. Instead of paying our veterans in bullets, tear bombs, and poison gas, the way the bonus army was paid, we paid in cash in 1936 the bonus which had been delinquent since 1924. Veterans in Pacific thus received $326,316.06.

I have sponsored two bills familiar to every Spanish War veteran, the Smith bill of 1935, paying their pensions in full, and the Philippine travel pay bill of 1940, as well as numerous other measures for hospitalization, increased benefits, and so forth.

I have favored every bill in the interests of the veterans of the World War, their widows and dependents which has come before Congress, and am nationally known for my active support of veterans' legislation. I shall continue this policy, for it is my firm belief that it is the solemn duty and sacred obligation of our Government never to forget, but always to remember and to compensate to the fullest possible extent those who have defended our Republic. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have always received from the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United Spanish War Veterans, the Disabled American Veterans, and their auxiliaries.

FEDERAL HOUSING—HOME OWNERS' LOAN—BANK DEPOSITS

As one of the five Members of the House who conferred with President Roosevelt March 20, 1934, and sponsored the first housing legislation in Congress, I am gratified at the benefits which have accrued therefrom to our people. In Pacific County 35 citizens have received loans aggregating $88,200 for the construction, modernization, and repair of their homes. This has been of vast benefit to the workers in the building trades, including electricians, painters, and plumbers, and the lumber, plywood, shingle, and other allied industries.

I actively supported the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act and am glad that 83 citizens of Pacific County have received loans aggregating $111,475.88. I expressed my belief in this legislation on April 28, 1933, in these words:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to render available the sum of $2,000,000,000 to restore, redeem, rehabilitate, and save the homes of many of the American people; and, Mr. Speaker, when we save the homes of the American people, we save America.

Depositors in the three banks of Pacific County have their deposits up to $5,000 insured by the Federal Government under the acts of Congress which I heartily supported and voted for. I am happy and proud that the Roosevelt administration has provided this protection and security for our people and that it has been my privilege to have a humble part in bringing about this great reform which should have been introduced many years ago.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

As an active member of the House Committee on Education, I have vigorously favored providing in public works and relief appropriation bills adequate funds to aid in paying the salaries of school teachers and maintain, repair, and improve our public-school buildings, as well as institutions of higher learning, as I consider the cause of public education and the recommendations of our parent-teacher associations to be paramount.

I favor the following program:

First. Adequate free public education for the children of the United States.

Second. Adequate pay for public-school teachers as a matter of justice and as a means of retaining in and attracting to the teaching profession the most competent, devoted, and best-equipped men and women.

Third. An annual minimum of at least 8 months' teaching in the public schools of all the States.

Fourth. An adequate number of safe, commodious, and well-equipped school buildings.

Fifth. Free textbooks for all public-school pupils.

Sixth. Adequate assistance by the Federal Government, through appropriations and otherwise, in accomplishing the foregoing objects.

Seventh. Such of the allied purposes as may serve the best interests of the teachers and pupils and the P.-T. A. in making the public schools a more effective, far-reaching, and American force in local, State, and National life.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

I have been an ardent outspoken advocate of old-age pensions during my service in Congress. I have continued the interest which as a veteran member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, I have manifested for the past 25 years. I have on every occasion promptly signed every petition to bring old-age pension and general welfare legislation before Congress for action.

I was the first Member of Congress to publicly espouse the Townsend plan in 1934 and in a brief 6 years have, as a member of our steering committee, actively participated in the growth of our movement until today we are approximating a sufficient following in the House of Representatives to enact our legislation in its present form into law. The United States Senate recently for the first time authorized a thorough study of the Townsend plan. In view of this progress we confidently expect to reelect enough of our old supporters and elect a sufficient number of new supporters in the elections this year to enact H. R. 8264 into law in the next Congress.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES

One of the most important enterprises which can be encouraged by the Federal Government is the developing, propagating, and conserving of our fish and game resources. I have therefore at all times cooperated with the House Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources and the various pogy, wildlife, sportsmen's, game, and rod and gun clubs and associations in southwest Washington. I voted for the Robertson-Pittman Act last year and the appropriation this year of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. The Federal contribution to our State is estimated at $60,575. to be matched by the State contributing $20,191.66, a total of $80,766.66. I have actively cooperated in obtaining W. P. A. and Federal funds for fish hatcheries, fish ponds and fish and game preserves and wildlife projects in southwest Washington.

I have given prompt attention to the requests received from the holders of fish and game licenses in southwest Washington for information regarding the Federal laws and pending legislation relating to the subject of wildlife.

FARM LEGISLATION

The farm problem is recognized as the most difficult with which we have to deal, having been acute since 1920. We have done more for the farmer than any previous national administration and have since 1932 doubled our farm income. We have recaptured our lost foreign export trade in agricultural products without sacrificing our home markets, and should you desire the official Government statistics bearing on this entire subject, please write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., or write to me and I shall be glad to obtain them for you. Self-seeking politicians running for office do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the facts. Therefore, if you are interested in ascertaining the true facts, I shall be glad to assist you in doing so. We have not entirely solved the farm problem, but we have made more progress toward a solution than any previous national administration.

The condition of the farmer everywhere is much better than it was in 1932, when his prices and market were the worst in the history of American agriculture. Think back to 1932 and compare the lot of the average farmer in your own neighborhood as it was then with his condition today in 1940 and you will realize this fact. We intend to keep on helping the farmer. It remains my opinion that the Grange cost-of-production plan to insure the farmer parity prices with industry offers the best solution of the farm problem. In the next Congress I shall again vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture, and would be glad to have you verify this fact by writing to Mr. Ervin E. King, master of Washington State Grange, 3104 Western Avenue, Seattle, Wash., or Mr. Fred Brenckman, legislative representative, National Grange, 1343 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

BONNEVILLE—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

I am proud of my sponsorship of the Bonneville $70,000,000 project and rural-electrification projects and shall exert every effort to bring their benefits to all our citizens.

LUMBER, SHINGLES, PULP, PLYWOOD INDUSTRIES

During my entire service in Congress, on every occasion without a single exception, I have supported and voted for beneficial legislation desired by the lumber, shingle, pulp, and plywood industries and advantageous to their workers, and have at all times extended to them my wholehearted cooperation. Self-seeking politicians apparently have no scruples in misrepresenting the facts. Therefore, if you wish to verify my statement in regard to my official record, I would suggest that you write to the official legislative representatives of the organizations to which our local industries belong: Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager, West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 364 Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., 340 White-Henry-Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; Henry Bahr, counsel, National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, 1337 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C.; Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, Tacoma Building, Tacoma, Wash.; O. M. Porter, secretary, United States Pulp Producers' Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

In the general election 2 years ago, in 1938, my Republican opponent had the nerve to display a bundle of shingles and talk about protection for shingles. At that time and for 5 years previously the shingle industry and workers enjoyed a 25-percent quota, the only protection in 25 years. The Republicans kept shingles on the duty-free list for 25 years, without any quota, causing Senator HOMER T. BONE, in the campaign in 1932, to say:

> The shingle industry was ruined because of this fact.

In the period since I took my seat in Congress in 1933 the shingle industry has been revived, old mills remodeled and equipped with new machinery, and new mills built, until now we have three times as many plants and number of shingle weavers employed as in 1932.

November 18, 1935, Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

> I hasten to send you this brief note to thank you for the fine help we received from you in our fight to secure the import quota on Canadian shingles. I want to express to you my appreciation of your efforts in our behalf.

To render the quota more effective I introduced the bill which became law for a census of the shingle industry. On May 27, 1937, Mr. McGrath wrote when President Roosevelt signed my bill:

> This news is about the most important that has come to red-cedar shingle manufacturers and the logging and lumber operators associated with the shingle business.

February 1, 1938, the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

> At the annual membership meeting of this association, held in Tacoma, February 1, 1938, a resolution was unanimously approved instructing the secretary to write you expressing the gratitude of this association for your faithful services in our behalf in connection with the import limitations on red-cedar shingles.

On November 2, 1938, the following news article was published in the Hoquiam Washingtonian:

> Shingle weavers commend SMITH: A resolution endorsing MARTIN F. SMITH in his campaign for reelection to Congress was passed this week by Grays Harbor Shingle Weavers Local 2576. The resolution endorsing SMITH is being sent to all shingle weaver unions in the district council. The resolution commends Congressman SMITH for diligent work in limiting importation of Canadian shingles into the United States.

In this Congress I have actively cooperated in efforts to secure aid for the workers and the shingle industry. Following vigorous efforts before the State Department and Ways and Means Committee, we have recently secured the passage of a bill providing for a duty of 25 cents per square on red-cedar shingles imported from Canada, the first duty imposed in 29 years. On June 28, 1940, David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

> The final passage of our shingle bill in the Senate on June 22 brings to a conclusion the long struggle to put shingles back on the duty list. To say that we are pleased expresses our feeling very mildly.
> Having full knowledge of the difficulty of getting a tariff bill through Congress, and particularly one giving protection to the shingle or lumber industries, we are grateful for the continuous thought and effort you have given our affairs.
> All during the struggle, since January 1, it has been heartening to know that you were tirelessly working for the passage of our shingle bill, and it has been of great value to the writer to be able to confer with you at any time when a conference was deemed necessary. You have been "on the job" for us and we are very appreciative.

I would suggest that when candidates of the opposing party talk about shingles that citizens ask them about the do-nothing record of their party for 25 years and the do-something record of the Roosevelt administration and request an explanation. I would appreciate citizens writing briefly what explanation, if any, they give. I am curious, as you must be after reading the foregoing recital of fact, to know what alibi and excuse they have to offer.

LUMBER EXCISE TAX

The lumber business is the best it has been in 10 years. Last year pay rolls and wages in private industry were the highest in the history of the State.

A candidate for Congress should have respect for the voters and for the office he is seeking. What about the candidate who deliberately circulates malicious falsehoods? Two years ago and again this year the same falsehood is being circulated and published that Members of Congress from our State, including myself, voted to reduce the excise tax on lumber. The best answer to this campaign lie was made December 12, 1938, by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager and legislative representative of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, of which our local lumber firms are members:

The west coast lumber industry has had the effective and loyal support of Mr. SMITH on every occasion when we have been asking for his help. He has voted for renewal of the excise tax on imported lumber on every occasion when the matter has been before Congress. He has supported our efforts to have lumber properly defined for taxing purposes, as in the classification of large timbers and with withdrawal of allowances for planing and milling. He has helped us in every question arising for the clarification and administration of the excise tax.

The West Coast Lumbermen's Association keeps wholly out of politics. I just want, as a matter of fairness, to point out that Mr. SMITH has been a very loyal and conscientious supporter of the interests of the lumber industry since he entered Congress. I feel it only square that this fact be made known.

S.ncerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Secretary-Manager.

My amendment of the lumber import excise tax, known as the Smith amendment, introduced as H. R. 7934, was attached to the revenue act in 1938 and passed the Senate, was approved by President Roosevelt, and became law. It prevents deductions for tonguing, planing, and grooving of imported lumber and is estimated to increase about 25 percent the excise tax, which is the tax unscrupulous candidates for Congress falsely accuse me of voting to reduce. April 4, 1938. Henry Bahr, counsel for the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, wrote me as follows:

Regarding your amendment of the lumber import excise tax, which was tacked onto the revenue bill in the Ways and Means Committee and retained by the Senate last week, I am sure Colonel Greeley must have told you how sincerely we appreciate your helpful cooperation in this matter.

Candidates of the opposite party should be asked by the voters why their party, under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930 and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922, left lumber and shingles on the duty-free list without any import excise tax or quota limitation, and provided 100-percent free trade with Canada. Such an explanation, if any, would be interesting; probably amusing.

PULP LEGISLATION

I am the author of H. R. 7312, the Smith bill to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921, to plug up and curtail importations of foreign pulp in competition with our local product. This bill has received wide support from the pulp and sulphite workers' unions and the manufacturers. It has strong support in Congress. The United States Pulp Producers' Association, O. M. Porter, has written me as follows:

I am very glad to be able to tell you that the executive committee of this association has instructed me to do everything possible toward developing Nation-wide support of your bill (H. R. 7312) to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921.

The changed conditions suddenly caused by the invasion of the Scandinavian countries and removal temporarily of competition from that quarter has deferred immediate action, but the legislation is in fine shape for consideration in the next Congress.

PEELER-LOG LEGISLATION

Past national administrations have permitted the exporting of peeler logs without hindrance so many years that now this, too, has created a problem to deal with. This has nothing to do with the reciprocal-trade agreements, which have made no change whatsoever. The question is simply one of whether we should limit the export of raw materials, the supply of which is becoming limited on account of our generosity in the past, which we now need for our own domestic use and manufacture by our own labor. I have vigorously favored the enactment of this legislation, which presents difficulties because it establishes a new precedent. Past neglect always renders application of the remedy difficult. The outlook for the enactment of this legislation in the near future is favorable on account of the hearings which have been held and the efforts which have been put forth in its behalf by the entire Washington congressional delegation. On May 24, 1940, Mr. Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, with which plywood manufacturers in southwest Washington are affiliated, wrote me:

The board of directors held its annual meeting on May 21, and I was directed to express to you the board's appreciation of the valuable assistance which you have given in the peeler-log matter.

APPOINTMENTS TO WEST POINT AND ANNAPOLIS

Jerry G. Clancy, of Ocean Park, was appointed in June 1937, to the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, on my recommendation and is due to graduate in 1941. Lowell Doupe, of Ilwaco, has been recommended by me for appointment to the United States Military Academy, West Point, on July 1, 1940.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION, CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The National Youth Administration has made a splendid record in the State of Washington, and many young men and women in my district have greatly benefited from the program. Through the office of Mr. John H. Binns, Washington State Administrator of the N. Y. A., I have obtained official figures on the out-of-school program and the school-work program which reflect the actual earnings of the young people. However, the figures on the college-work program do not take into account students living in my district but attending college elsewhere. There are, of course, a great many young men and women from southwest Washington at the University of Washington, Washington State College, and elsewhere, and they are receiving their full share of the college-work funds. In Pacific County a total of 37 young men and women have participated in the out-of-school work program, receiving total monthly earnings of $555. Seven schools of Pacific County are included in the school-work program, with a total of 41 student workers and a total yearly quota of $1,674.

The useful and constructive work performed by the young men in the C. C. C. camps has received universal praise. In my district, in addition to building trails, roads, and bridges, the prevention of floods and soil erosion, and other public improvements, their services in effectively fighting forest fires has resulted in a saving of millions of dollars. The young men themselves have benefited greatly from the training and instruction which they have received, and, of course, their own compensation and the allotments to their dependents have provided added purchasing power. The expenditures for materials and supplies in the vicinity of the camps have been a direct benefit to numerous business firms and merchants. C. C. C. camps have been in operation in practically every county in my district and the entire State of Washington

On June 22, 1940, I voted for H. R. 5138, the most thorough and far-reaching revision of our immigration and deportation laws in the past 25 years. It is directed against all subversive, "fifth column," and un-American activities, and provides punishment for those who attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. H. R. 5138, as amended, was carefully considered, and provides effective remedies against all foreign "isms" without violating our Constitution and American traditions.

My friends, we have the finest country and best government on earth. Let us keep them that way. There is no room in America for communism, fascism, nazi-ism. There is room for only one "ism," and that is Americanism. We are going to keep America out of Europe, and we are going to keep Europe out of America.

The Virginia Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 5, 1940

ADDRESS BY JOHN W. CARTER

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, at the State convention of the Democratic Party in Virginia, held in Roanoke, Va., on June 14, State Senator John W. Carter, as keynoter for the Democratic Party of Virginia, delivered a most eloquent and brilliant address, which I ask unanimous consent to insert in part in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the Virginia State Democratic Convention, I feel a deep sense of appreciation for the high privilege which is mine in serving as temporary chairman of this convention. I also feel quite keenly the burden of responsibility that rests upon me, in that, by custom, it becomes my duty to sound a battle cry for the militant Virginia democracy in the campaign of 1940.

THE WORLD AFLAME

I think we all must agree that it is peculiarly fitting that this convention assembles here in this magnificent city of Roanoke on the 14th day of June. That day is the birthday of the American flag. Never before within my observation or reading have so many Americans, thinking Americans, felt that that flag, the country of which it is a symbol, the system of government for which it stands, are all in dire peril of complete annihilation at the behest of a foreign despot; never before have any of us even suspected that this fair land of ours, consecrated to liberty and devoted to the arts of peace, was a likely victim to the hungry and blood-besmeared jaws of a cruel and monstrous tyrant devoid of any sense of mercy, any knowledge of justice, or any disposition to live, except by the law of force.

I think it was in the issue of the Philistine, which left the press just a day or two before its publisher, Elbert Hubbard, set sail from New York on the last voyage of the ill-fated Lusitania, that there appeared an article from Hubbard's pen under the caption "Who took the lid off of hell?" That question does not now seem apropos. None of us care very much to know who took the lid off. Most of us think we do know who performed that despicable act. What counts is that all of us know that the lid is, in fact, off, and a startled world, with the horror that is within their hearts reflected on their faces, stands by and gazes into an infernal cauldron of death and destruction so terrible and so devastating as to almost make us doubt the correctness of our perceptions. We want to disbelieve what our eyes see and what our ears hear. We would like to treat as chimerical what our reason tells us must be true. But, unfortunately, we cannot, like Alice, avail ourselves of the privilege of going through the looking glass into wonderland. We are a part of this war-wracked world, and a part of it we must remain.

True it is, as was said by President Roosevelt in his Chicago speech of October 5, 1937: "America hates war and hopes for peace; therefore America actively engages in the search for peace." But America is not stupid enough to hope to secure peace by talk, and America is unwilling to accept peace at the price of submission to the will of a little madman with a Charley Chaplin mustache, who, like a big tick, has fattened himself on blood and who has the insane delusion that he has been appointed of God (of course, a German god) to rule all men according to his own peculiar views. The Nazi philosophy of government is the antithesis of ours. Thank God America is free, and America intends to remain free.

What is liberty? What is freedom? It is so commonplace to us that I fear many would have difficulty in analyzing and defining it. I mention a few, and I emphasize that they are only a few, of the attributes of liberty as we know it:

1. Freedom of worship, which means that every man has the inalienable right to approach his God according to the dictates of his own conscience.

2. Freedom of speech, which means the right of every man to say what he thinks on any subject he chooses.

3. Freedcm of the press, which means the right of anyone to disseminate his views with respect to those who are in power without opposition and punishment from official source.

4. The right of trial by a jury of one's peers, which protects one from the arbitrary act of a governing class.

5. Protection of the writ of habeas corpus, which is insurance against arbitrary imprisonment for long years without a formal charge being made and without a speedy trial on such charge.

6. The right and security of property and due process of law, which means our Government is not powerful enough to take away from one of us, even the yearling calf that is ours, or the lawn mower that we have acquired. They are ours against the world, and we are deprived of them only by the law of the land, applying alike to all others.

7. Protection from ex post facto laws. That is to say, laws which make something we have done unlawful which was not unlawful when we did it. In short, protection against arbitrary power.

8. Right of equality of opportunity. In other words, we are guaranteed a free field and no favors.

There is not a man who lives under a Nazi-controlled government, a Fascist-controlled government, or a communistic-controlled government who enjoys a single one of these rights which we insist are God-given and exercised just as naturally as we breathe pure air or drink pure water. We think nothing of them, and yet life would be unbearable without them. They may be likened to the air we breathe, for so long as we breathe it it never occurs to us to be grateful for such a privilege. But cut the air off and we soon strangle and suffocate for the lack of it.

Understand me; I do not think that America has become panic-stricken. I do not think that it has lost its courage. I believe that it will fight for its land, its liberty, and its institutions with the ferocity born of its indignation that any crackpot dictator could conceive of the subjugation of our free people. If I felt otherwise I should feel constrained to go just 50 miles north of where I speak, where rest the ashes of Lee and Jackson, and there apologize to the disembodied spirits of those heroes for the existence of a race of pusillanimous Virginians. No; America is not afraid and America is not stupid. It realizes that in modern warfare bravery alone cannot overcome mechanized armies with terrible destructive powers. It realizes that to pit mere manpower against thousands of armored tanks and fast-moving armored airplanes means simply a futile slaughter of brave men without effective resistance to such invading forces.

America is not afraid, neither is it foolish. If it were reasonably sure of a flood it would not yield to terror, but it would make preparations for defense against the flood. It now believes that it is faced with the threat of attack from a powerfully armed and ruthless foe. It is not afraid of that attack, but it intends to prepare for it, and prepare for it to the teeth.

Congress has and will respond to the President's request for billions to be employed to build up the national defense. Industry will respond to the administration's request to coordinate, speed up our productive system, take care of the back-breaking load that is necessary to arm ourselves in time to make resistance effective. Labor is prepared to do its full part in this great defense program, and the manpower of the Nation will quickly show that it is ready for the training that will make our new warships, our new tanks, and our new airplanes effective, and that promptly, to defend Old Glory and those things for which it stands.

The foremost issue in this campaign and the first question which the voters will determine is this: What is the best qualified agency to which we may entrust the big job of building an impregnable national defense in this serious national crisis? In my judgment the answer will necessarily be: The Democratic Party.

As briefly as I may, please permit me to give you the reasons which I think will prompt this answer. Let me first of all assure you that man for man I am quite sure that there is as much patriotism in the Republican ranks as there is in ours. That has been demonstrated ere this; it will probably be demonstrated in the future. If the time shall come when we shall have to contend with a "fifth column" you will find few of such recruited from the ranks of republicanism and the ranks of democracy. With both of those parties partisanry has always ceased at the frontier in time of war.

However, it is my belief that partisanry is now more active in the ranks of the Republicans than among the Democrats and that so long as there is no certainty of attack from abroad there may be a tendency to seek to embarrass the Democratic administration by thrusts at its program. For example, I am quite sure that all America, Republicans and Democrats alike, shared with me a feeling of distinct disappointment when Governor Landon, after a visit to the White House, to which he had been invited for the purpose of securing the benefit of his views on urgent questions affecting the defense of his country and ours, took occasion to give out an interview the sole purpose of which seemed to be to secure a political advantage for his party as the price for the cooperation of himself and his fellow Republicans in preparing America against attack from abroad. To my mind, it was the cheapest sort of effort at a cheap political trade under circumstances that should have made it impossible for a man of Governor Landon's status to even consider such a thing. I am sure that the overwhelming majority of the rank and file of the Republican Party no more approved of his course than I did. I had hoped that Mr. Landon stood alone, but my hopes were shattered on May 23—one week after the President's appeal for increased armaments—when I read in the column of Mr. Walter Lippmann the following extract:

"The Republican leaders could not talk as they have talked the past few days if they realized the extreme and immediate peril in which America has been placed. Apparently they are still under the impression that the question is whether we shall let our sympathy for the Allies lead us into the European war; apparently they still think that the question is whether Mr. Roosevelt is to get some kind of political advantage at home out of the catastrophe overseas. They are tragically mistaken. These are no longer the questions before the public."

Certainly Mr. Lippmann has not been unfriendly to the Republican Party; certainly he voted for Mr. Landon in 1936; and, therefore, when I read this item I was forced to the conclusion that important Republicans, including their congressional leaders, had taken their cue from the titular leader and were seeking to make political capital out of the dangerous situation in which our country finds itself.

I do not believe that the rank and file of the people of this country, either Republicans or Democrats, will be willing to accept such leadership in the big job of preparing America to defend itself and its very existence.

Again, I think the people of America, those of both the major parties, are people of common sense and that in their own important affairs they would hesitate to employ amateurs to serve them in matters of great consequence. Remember that the task of preparation will in all probability extend beyond the end of the present administration. For 7½ years the Republicans have been entirely without experience in administering the affairs of the National Government. They have been wholly unrepresented in the executive department of the Government. For 6 of those 7½ years their representation in the House of Representatives has been negligible and always in the minority. For all of that time their representation in the Senate has been pitifully small. For 6 of those years one could count their Governors on one's fingers. Not a single one of their prospective candidates for the Presidency has had any experience whatsoever as a Federal or State executive. In good times or bad, as far as domestic affairs are concerned, the country might be willing to take a chance on committing our interests to an amateur but not in the face of a crisis when the failure to properly meet that crisis spells complete disaster to our Nation and its institutions. It would be just as sensible to discharge all of the members of an experienced fire department as they are on their way to combat a conflagration that threatened the existence of a city and replace them with men who had never seen a fire. It would be just as sensible to get rid of an experienced Coast Guard personnel when a terrific storm was approaching our shores and substitute the Old Man of the Mountain. No; America will not select amateurs to perfect its national defense at this stage of its existence.

Further, I believe that the American people are capable of looking to the record and determining for themselves which of the two parties has historically demonstrated the greater efficiency in preparing for war.

A cursory examination of the record will develop the fact that a Democratic President, Woodrow Wilson, foresaw the necessity for a real American Navy, and formulated a great plan to carry his idea into effect. The plan was adopted by a Democratic Congress and later scrapped by Republican administration. If it had not been so scrapped, we would today be able to successfully contend with the combined navies of the entire world. On February 3, 1916, in a speech at St. Louis, Wilson insisted that America should at once begin to build and sustain "incomparably the most adequate Navy in the world." What he meant, as subsequent developments show, was a Navy that could protect America from the combined navies of the world. Shortly afterward, his plan was submitted to Congress. Obviously this result could not be achieved overnight. The proposed legislation provided for a longe-range building program whereby America would be the strongest naval power in the world within 20 years, notwithstanding the efforts of any other nations to compete with it. America had the money to build such a Navy. The other nations were not so fortunate. The plan became law in August 1916, and continued effective so long as the Democratic Party remained in power. The building was begun and continued at a rapid rate of speed. It was not a program on paper. At the close of the Wilson administration the ways of every shipyard in the country bore evidence of the fact that America intended to be able to command the seas if it chose so to do.

The plan is described by a great naval authority as "an unprecedented naval program." The same authority says that "Wilson went to Paris determined that America's position of eminence on the sea should be preserved for her own future welfare, as well as for that of the world. Plans went forward at home for continuing his great naval program of 1916."

But in 1921 the Republican Party came back into power, and before that year was ended President Harding called for an international conference to consider naval limitations. That conference met in Washington. I quote from page 426 of "A History of the United States Navy," written by Captain Dudley W. Knox, and published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, of New York:

"After an address by President Harding, Secretary of State Hughes opened the Washington Conference on November 12, 1921, by offering a plan of naval limitation which astonished the foreign delegates by its altruistic liberality. He proposed establishing an upper limit of tonnage for each category of ships, which would provide for parity between Great Britain and the United States and limit Japan's tonnages to three-fifths of those allocated to the other two. At that time the United States had a very large margin of ships built and building over and above the proposed basis. Compared with Britain our superiority amounted to 340,000 tons of capital ships (equivalent to about 10 battleships or battle cruisers), 112,000 tons of destroyers (equivalent to nearly 100 of these vessels) and 9,500 tons of submarines. In the aggregate our superiority over the Japanese quota was nearly the same. All three countries were to do some scrapping of capital ships in order to effect a general reduction, but the American program of destruction was marked by the generous selection of many of her own ships on the building ways, into whose plans had been incorporated the lessons of the late war, and besides this we offered to eliminate our surplus over the others in the aggregate of nearly 460,000 tons of ships. In return they were asked for similar concessions in the cruiser category, in which the British superiority over us was about 81,000 tons, and the corresponding Japanese advantage was 41,000."

All of America's suggested concessions were accepted. We agreed to the treaty and as a result we scuttled more warships than any nation had ever lost or given up as the result of conquest. We had in course of construction as the result of Wilson's policy the greatest Navy that ever sailed the seas, far greater than either England or Japan, and practically equal to both. We had actually spent $330,000,000 to that date in carrying out the Wilson plan, many of the capital ships being more than 50 percent complete.

We not only destroyed and sunk this armada, but we paid out of our pockets $25,000,000 as the cost of this silly operation. Mr. Hughes, then Secretary of State, said, "It was the most magnificent gesture in the interest of world peace that had ever been made by any civilized nation." And yet they say that the Democrats are the idealists and theorists, and the Republicans are the hard-headed practical men. I wouldn't call it a magnificent gesture. I would say that it was pluperfect asininity.

Irvin Cobb, the humorist, appreciated the situation as falling distinctly within his field. He said that "We took a worse licking in that conference than we would ever take or had taken on the field of battle."

But we had not yet satisfied Britain and Japan, so there came the London conference on limitation of naval armaments "called," says Captain Knox, "at the instance of President Hoover after his personal interview with Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the British Prime Minister," and when we got through with that conference we had yielded a further loss to Britain of 396,871 tons; and to Japan 450,178 tons of naval shipping. If my memory serves me correctly, President Hoover was one of those practical hard-headed Republicans, not a sentimental, soft-headed Democrat.

No wonder that when Franklin Roosevelt assumed office March 4, 1933, the Navy was at a low ebb, and it took his vigorous efforts to build and commission close to 140 fighting ships within the last 7¼ years in order that the Navy might be brought to its present peak, so far as peacetime power is concerned. I have confidence in the common intelligence of the American people, and with this record before them, I have no doubt as to their decision as to which of the two parties may be best trusted to arm America for a supreme conflict.

Another reason which induces me to believe that the American people, without reference to partisan alinements, will insist upon a Democratic administration for the next 4 years, during which in all probability America's fate (to paraphrase Mr. Hitler) will be settled for the next 1,000 years, is perhaps of a political nature, but nevertheless highly important, and will weigh heavily when understood by the people. Teamwork at this time is essential. Conflict and controversy in Washington would be highly unfortunate. Of course, a minority may render great service by pointing out objections that may be sound and that will stay the hand of the majority and cause it to reach sounder conclusions. No political student would deny this theory. But this purpose is not accomplished by having divided responsibility. Legislation is enacted by the House, the Senate, and the President. If any one of the three balks, legislation fails. Here is not a case of effective influence exerted by a minority through its opportunity to criticize. Here is confusion worse confounded. Now, if this is true, the people of the United States are confronted with the cold fact that in the absence of a miracle, the Senate of the United States will remain Democratic for the first 2 years of the next administration, and probably for the entire 4 years of that administration. The bare facts show this to be true.

The present Senate is composed of 69 Democrats, 23 Republicans, 2 Farmer-Laborites, 1 Progressive, and 1 Independent; total, 96. At the November election 32 Senators are to be elected for 6-year terms and 4 are to be elected for shorter terms, they now filling vacancies created by deaths. This is a total of 36 Senators to be reelected; of the 36, 26 are Democrats, 8 are Republicans, 1 is a Progressive, and 1 is a Farmer-Laborite. A majority of the Senate is 49. The Democrats may lose 20 seats now held by them and still retain that majority. Assuming that they make no gains of seats now held by Republicans or members of other parties, they can lose 20 of the 26 seats that are theirs and up for reelection and still control the Senate.

In other words, if they elected only 6 of the 36 Senators who will be candidates in November, they will organize that body, appoint its committees, and have a veto upon the acts of the President and the House of Representatives, conceding that the Republicans elect the President and a majority of the House. Six of the Senators who are to be elected will be chosen from the southern States of Florida, Mississippi, Virginia, Texas, and Tennessee.

It would indeed be an optimistic Republican who could conceive of any one of those five Southern States electing a Republican Senator this fall. As a matter of fact, there is almost a certainty that the Democrats will elect at least 10 other Senators, and a probability that they will lose only 2 of the 26 seats. If this analysis is correct, control of the Senate by the Democrats for the first 2 years of the next administration is assured. And the probabilities are that that control is assured during the entire 4 years of such administration.

In this view of the case I do not believe that the common sense of the American people will insist upon a change of party control in the Presidency and in the House of Representatives when they know such change cannot be made in the Senate. Never was there a time in the country's history when teamwork was more essential and the only way teamwork can be assured is to elect a Democratic President and a Democratic House.

For the foregoing reasons I am satisfied that this great issue, this paramount issue, this issue which is of more importance to America than any it has ever confronted during the course of its existence, will be decided by the American electorate in accordance with the Democratic viewpoint, and in support of that party.

DOMESTIC ISSUES

In an effort to discuss domestic issues, I think it may be well to go back a bit and trace the historical attitude of the two great parties. The Democratic Party owes its existence to Thomas Jefferson. The Republican Party acknowledges the paternity of Alexander Hamilton. The opposing political views of these two statesmen give a certain clue to the respective political views of the two parties. Hamilton was an outspoken monarchist and believed the British form of government the most desirable. He realized that monarchy would not be accepted by Americans who had revolted from it, but in the Constitutional Convention he advocated the nearest thing to it that he thought had a chance of getting by. He favored a President elected for life, with powers to name the Governors of the States for life. These Governors to have an absolute veto power over legislation enacted by the peoples' chosen representatives. He also advocated a United States Senate elected for life. Madison's reports of the Convention give the substance of a 5-hour address by Mr. Hamilton on the advantages of a House of Lords. After its ratification he spoke of the Constitution as a "shilly-shally thing." And late in life he said, "Day by day I am more and more convinced that I was not made for this American world." His bosom friend, Gouverneur Morris, delivered his funeral oration. In Morris' diary the night before the oration, he spoke of Hamilton as follows:

"He was in principle opposed to republican, and attached to monarchial government."

These same facts are reflected in the writings and letters of Gouverneur Morris, Rufus King, Thomas Pickering, George Cabot, and Fisher Ames, all friends of Hamilton and members of his party.

On the other hand, Jefferson was a great Democrat, with confidence in the ability of the people to govern themselves. He at first opposed the Constitution because it contained no Bill of Rights that guaranteed the people from governmental action that might limit freedom of speech, freedom of the press, religious liberty, and the right of peaceable assembly.

He suggested the first 10 amendments, the Federal Bill of Rights, and after their adoption he became an advocate and supporter of the Constitution.

Throughout their careers Hamilton favored special interests and privilege, and Jefferson proceeded upon his announced tenet, "Equal rights to all, special privileges to none."

After the deaths of these two leaders the parties divided on similar lines. It was the Republican Party that supported the special privileges of Nick Biddle's National Bank. It was the Democrat, Andrew Jackson, who destroyed that bank and all that it stood for. The tariff was seized by the Republicans as an agency to direct unearned profits into the pockets of the powerful. The Democrats contended that tariffs should only be applied for the good of the whole people. This battle first developed in full force during Cleveland's administration. Then came the Wilson administration, which continued over Republican protest to fight for the common people. Then was established the Federal Reserve System for the purpose of preventing the hoarding of the money of the country in the vaults of Wall Street banks for the use of gamblers and speculators, and sending it instead circulating throughout the Nation for the benefit of every section, sect, and class.

The Federal Trade Commission was created. The Rural Credit System was provided for the farmer. An income-tax law was passed, and the popular election of Senators made a reality. There was not a single piece of reactionary legislation enacted during the Wilson era. All that was proposed was bitterly fought by the Republicans, but when they afterward came into power and remained in power for 12 years, they dared not repeal a line of it.

During the Wilson administration the national wealth increased from $187,000,000,000 to $330,000,000,000. And there was a widespread diversion of this wealth among the public generally rather than its concentration in a few hands.

A distinguished author, Mr. W. W. Durbin, of Ohio, has made a list of the outstanding Democratic achievements from its beginning through the Wilson administration, and it is as follows:

"The Democratic Party wrecked the Hamiltonian plan of making a partnership between government and a money power.

"It forced into the Constitution the Bill of Rights.

"It killed the un-American alien and sedition laws.

"It extended the domain of the Nation through the acquisition of the Territories of Louisiana and Florida, and later added California.

"It gave the Nation the Monroe Doctrine.

"It destroyed Nick Biddle's bank, which was threatening to dominate the Nation in the interest of a few.

"It crushed the nullification movement under Jackson.

"It threw open the public lands to settlers.

"It stood foursquare for constitutional rights during the reign of terror of the period of reconstruction after the Civil War.

"It has fought special privilege from the days of Jefferson to those of Wilson.

"It pioneered the fight for an income tax.

"It stood for the popular election of Senators.

"It created the Federal Reserve System.

"It gave to the farmers the Rural Credits Act.

"It gave to labor the Magna Carta of its rights.

"It passed the first national act to end child slavery.

"A Democratic administration directed with brilliant success the greatest war in history.

"A Democratic President gave to mankind the plan of international cooperation for the ending of militarism and international slaughter to which more than 50 nations have subscribed.

"The history of the Democratic Party is the history of the development and extension of the democratic principle on the American Continent."

After Wilson came 12 years of Republican rule under Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. We all know what happened. During the Harding administration the Government was actually turned over to a gang of thieves. That was the day of the Ohio gang. Gaston Means, Jess Smith, Charley Forbes, and Albert B. Fall had to be "seen," and I do mean "seen" in its worst sense, before anybody could get anything done. And, of course, we know that when "seen," they proceeded upon the theory that the laborer was worthy of his hire. Vast oil reserves of the Government were bartered away by a cabinet officer who afterward went to jail. And this with the approval of Secretary of the Navy Denby, and Assistant Secretary Theodore Roosevelt, Jr.

I, of course, hasten to add that no one thought that there was anything consciously wrongful in the conduct of Messrs. Denby and Roosevelt. They merely proved to be stupid. But you know the loss of your property, when arranged for by fools, hurts just as bad as when stolen by thieves. Then came silent Cal, and the Government ran itself while Cal wouldn't talk.

There followed the great engineer who promised to abolish poverty. More than 8,000 banks closed their doors up to February 1932, and by the end of the Republican regime all of them had closed. The railroads sickened and languished until they were on the verge of bankruptcy. The farmers, never so prosperous as during the Wilson administration, were faced with almost universal foreclosures, and prices for farm products were at the lowest scale in history. The small merchant and shopkeeper were staggering down the path of insolvency. Labor was unemployed and hopeless. To paraphrase Don Quixote: "In voting the Republican Party into power the American people went out for wool and came home shorn themselves."

Under the administration of the marvelous engineer then occupying the White House there was industrial chaos, commercial stagnation, transportation paralysis of the creeping kind, agricultural disaster, business calamity, and banking collapse, while a great nation stood with grief and hopelessness waiting what appeared to be the absolute wreckage of what it had thought was a matchless economic structure. Some wag has been unkind enough to say that Hoover was indeed a great engineer because inside of 4 years he damned and ditched a hundred and twenty million American citizens.

I do not believe my Republican friends will question the accuracy of the picture I have painted as it existed on March 3, 1933. The following day, March 4, 1933, saw the first inauguration of Franklin D. Roosevelt. I was in Washington on that occasion. I could sense the depth of the gloom that smothered the gayety and pageantry of the inaugural parade. No bank was open in the United States except in Virginia and Delaware. Factories were idle, mines shut down, farms not being operated because that meant loss instead of profit, merchants were marking up on their calendars the dates on which they expected to file their bankruptcy petitions, labor was idle. There was no sunshine anywhere, and no prospect of any. There was no confidence that conditions would or could improve. Twelve years of Republican misgovernment had caused the American people to lose faith in the effectiveness of their institutions. There was nothing but black despair in the hearts of our people. Many thinking and prudent men felt that a revolution was pending, and that America would shortly be governed by the mob. Of course, I know that Mr. Hoover explained the whole thing as resulting from the failure of some bank in Austria, but I have never found anyone who agreed with him.

I do know that within 30 days a miracle had been accomplished. Banks that had closed rather than be closed by their depositors were open again, doing a normal business and maintaining the confidence of the public; business had begun to march slowly but surely; people were going back to work bit by bit, but above all, despair had been replaced by hope and faith. The frowning brow was replaced by the smile of confidence. A song in the heart took the place of that piece of lead that had been there so long. The American people had taken on new life, had recovered their courage, and were determined to make things work.

I say that this was a miracle, and it came about because the Democratic Party had given to the country a leader who had confidence in himself and his country, and the power to radiate that confidence into his fellow citizens, and save a collapsing American political and business economy. He had the power to give them confidence in banks that but a few days before they had hated and distrusted. He gave them confidence that industry would come back, that farming could recover, that trade and commerce could again be restored. Above all he gave them confidence in themselves. That day the Hoover depression was over and we started on the long, long trail back to "normalcy."

As to how far we have gotten opinions differ, but I shall contend that we have come a long ways. I shall not contend that mistakes have not been made. I do not approve of all that has been done myself, but on the whole I insist the job is a good one. and in attempting to prove this I shall use a method which I like to employ in my practice of law. Whenever I can select from my opponent's testimony facts asserted by his witnesses and be able to show that under the law such evidence entitles my clients to a verdict, I feel pretty sure of winning my case. Here and now I shall attempt to prove a case for democracy on the basis of the evidence that I draw from the statements made by our opponents.

I call as my first adverse witness: Mr. Samuel B. Pettengill of Indiana, a former Member of Congress, and without doubt the bitterest critic and most uncompromising opponent of the present Democratic administration that lives in America today. I quote from his most recent work, "Smoke Screen," which has come from the press during this good year of 1940. In his chapter "Balance Sheet" on pages 80 and 81, he sets up what he regards as the items to be placed on the asset side of the ledger in making an accounting of the administration activities. I list the items under assets, not as selected by me, but as chosen by this witness for the other side. They are:

"The divorcement of commercial and investment banking.
"The guaranty of bank deposits.
"The regu'ation of stock exchanges.
"The regulation of the interstate sale of securities.
"The growth of national income from 42 to 68 billions.
"Reciprocal-trade agreements, on net balance more gain than loss.
"Part of the public utility bill.
"The Lindbergh Act and the war on kidnaping.
"The C. C. C. Camps.
"Much of the P. W. A. program.
"Soil conservation.
"The handling of foreign affairs and national defense.
"The recognition of the right of collective bargaining.
"Home Owners' Loan Corporation.
"Federal Housing Administration.
"Relief—but badly managed.
"Civil Aeronautics Administration.
"Pure food and drug amendments.
"Truck and bus legislation."

It seems to me that if such an uncompromising opponent has to agree to this imposing list of accomplishments as assets, it must be conceded that whatever else the administration has done, it has concluded a tremendously helpful program in behalf of the American people and in the interest of industrial recovery.

However, that is not all that I develop from this hostile witness. On page 72 of the same book Mr. Pettengill asserts that if an American were to meet a foreigner and that each brought with him their respective shares of all of the gold in the world, the American would bring 97 percent and the foreigner 3 percent.

And then he lists a table of other commodities with like percentages listed for the American and the foreigner. I quote that table from page 72 of his book:

	American percent	Foreigner percent
Wheat	74	26
Butter	81	19
Milk	83	17
Coal	86	14
Cotton	93	7
Petroleum	96	4
Telephones	94	6
Aluminum	82	18
Cement	83	17
Silver	83	17
Tobacco	86	14
Rayon	87	13
Steel	90	10
Movie shows	91	9
Telephone calls	94	6
Automobiles	96	4
Railroad mileage	86	14
Improved highway mileage	88	12
Radios	94	6
Bathtubs	98	2
Civilian airplanes	97	3

How is it possible for anyone to contend that an administration of American affairs has failed in view of the showing that the overwhelming majority of both necessities and luxuries today are in the possession of Americans as against foreigners. The lowest percentage is wheat, of which America owns 74 percent of the entire world supply. The highest is bathtubs, of which it owns 98 percent. And civilian airplanes, automobiles, and petroleum, telephones, telephone calls, radios, movie shows and steel come closely behind, all with percentages over 90.

My second witness is Mr. Thomas E. Dewey, candidate for the Republican nomination, who tells us that if elected he will not abandon the social legislation of the last 7 years, but merely improve it.

My third witness is Senator VANDENBERG, another candidate, who is burning with a zeal to save the accomplishments of the present administration.

My fourth witness is Senator TAFT, who says that he, too, wants to continue the policies of the Democratic administration with respect to relief, but thinks that can be better done through State agencies.

My next witnesses are Dr. Glenn Frank and the several hundred distinguished Republicans who serve on the Republican program committee. They include a number of influential members of the party, of which it may be well to mention Col. Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., of New York, and Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, president of Stanford University. This committee was assigned by the Republican National Committee "to ascertain as fully as possible the various views held by the rank and file of the Republican Party, its national and local leaders, including auxiliaries of men, women and youth, upon such questions as may properly come before it for consideration." In his letter of transmittal to the national chairman, Dr. Frank says: "In the judgment of the chairman and executive committee, the report faithfully reflects that consensus of rank and file Republican opinion which the Republican National Committee directed the program committee to secure and record."

In the foreword of the report we find this statement: "In this document the program committee undertakes to reflect its analysis of the philosophy, policies, and actual results of the present administration and to throw into contrast thereto what, in its judgment, should be the guiding principles of national policy for dealing with the problem of getting our national economy into sustained high gear so that we can realize full employment of our men, our money, and our materials, a progressive rise in our living standards, and an increased security for our people."

Then the report discusses various public questions. It advocates staying out of war and is quite fearful of what might happen if we got in. I don't suppose that this is any different from the viewpoint of the Democratic Party. Certainly there is no charge to that effect. The report next expresses the opinion that America has suffered dreadfully during the past seven and a half years and gives some misleading figures and statistics to support the claim. It does not, however, suggest a return to the days and processes of the Hoover administration. It is next asserted that the Democratic administration misunderstands America; that it has attempted to copy big business; that it has applied the brakes to production; and that it has thought that America was running down. It is said that the administration turns its back on the expansion of enterprise; that it is defeatist and reactionary. Not a line or syllable of proof is attempted in behalf of these generalities. Then, under the title The Republican Position, it says that their party does not believe that the country has run down; nor does it believe in defeatism; that, on the contrary, "Our frontiers are better than ever; the Nation's plant is underbuilt; new enterprise is in sight; investment opportunities are ample and expansion is possible." It says, "Our private economy is not at a dead end." All of this information, of course, is of the most delightful character and, so far as I know, not disputed by anyone.

Foreign relations are met with indisputable courage. I quote:

"The foreign policy of the United States must be determined by a realistic consideration of the political, economic, and military situation that now obtains throughout the world. We must not allow our emotions to unfit us for rational analysis of what will best safeguard our own national institutions, ideals, and interests and best enable us to play a constructive role in our relations with the rest of the world. There is no conflict between these two objectives. The first concern of our foreign policy must be to protect the security and welfare of the American people. This security and welfare, however, will be served by every advance that is made toward a more peaceful and more rationally ordered world. Our political and economic foreign policy, therefore, should be flexible enough that, in a rapidly changing international situation, we can adopt the measures that will, at any given time, most effectively serve both these purposes."

If you can find any one man in the United States who disagrees with that I want to meet him.

The report, given out on February 18 of this year, contains the startling news that there is war in Europe and Asia, and recognizes the fact that as individual Americans we shall react emotionally to these wars, but that we ought to be very careful and not do anything about it. It goes on to say that we ought to keep out of other people's wars, but ought to defend the Western Hemisphere. It insists that we should reaffirm our adherence to the principles of decent international behavior.

It next points to international trends toward prohibitive tariff quotas and Government trade control, and adds this highly controversial statement:

"As this movement toward self-sufficiency spreads in more and more nations, it tends more and more to isolate the United States from its traditional role in world trade. We cannot, of course, dictate the trade policies of other nations. If the present trend toward national self-sufficiency continues, we must frankly face the problem of organizing our own economic life on the basis of a large measure of self-sufficiency. Happily, we are better situated than almost any other nation to live within our own resources. The few resources we lack could, no doubt, be secured through carefully negotiated reciprocity treaties even in a world largely given over to policies of self-containment.

"We should make clear in our foreign-policy pronouncements, however, that we stand ready to cooperate, if and when cooperation is possible, in clearing away the obstacles to such access to raw materials and such flow of international trade as will enable the vigorous forces of the modern productive system to make their full contribution to well-being the world around."

There follows a Republican idea of a realistic trades-relation program toward America, as follows:

"First, we must fully protect our own national living standards, the wages of our workers, and the income of our farmers. However fully we may recognize the long-run fallacy of the present world epidemic of trade restrictions, we must not indulge in any trade policies at this time that will make the United States the dumping ground for the subsidized and politically managed exports of other countries.

"Second, we must try to increase our foreign trade by every measure available consistent with the protection of our living standards, the wages of our workers, and the income of our farmers. This will require a constructive administration of our tariff relationships. The measures that may be taken will be varied. Some tariffs may have to be raised, some lowered, some left alone. And such progress toward an increased foreign trade as can be made under the present world situation can be made only by intelligent and realistic negotiation of trade agreements through which genuine reciprocity benefits are realized, with the agreements subject to the safeguard of approval by concurrent resolution of both Houses of the Congress.

"The function of our tariff policy, in view of the abnormal world situation, must be to protect our own best interests and to promote, as far as the restrictive policies of the rest of the world will permit, a revival of world trade.

"It is not the function of tariff policy to erect walls so high that behind them industries can maintain excessive prices or be so completely freed from external competition that they become inefficient. The people have the right to expect government to protect them against monopolistic advantage created by tariff favors. For tariff policy, like every other policy of government, is but a tool with which to advance the welfare of the people as a whole. Tariffs should be modified whenever necessary to realize this result. Their modification should be made not by logrolling but by expert study, research, and open democratic processes."

If there could be a more vague and indefinite foreign policy than that advocated by the committee, I cannot well conceive what it could be.

But when the committee reaches it chapter Toward Labor Program, it rings the changes. It states "four goals of American workers," as follows:

"Enlightened American workers have four main goals: (1) To secure for every employable industrial worker a job in productive enterprise at the best possible wage, under the best possible working conditions, and on a schedule of hours that makes satisfactory living possible for the worker and the worker's family; (2) to develop whatever form or forms of organization of American workers will best enable them to protect and to promote their every legitimate interest in the industrial process; (3) to stimulate a progressive increase of the contribution of labor toward an improved efficiency of American industry; and (4) to give informed voice to the judgment of American workers in the determination of those public policies which give over-all direction to our national economy."

It fails to suggest any means whatever whereby any one of the goals may be reached.

However, the first criticism it offers is in this part of the report. It says:

"There is, however, in the judgment of this committee, justified dissatisfaction with varied aspects of the National Labor Relations Act and with its administration by the National Labor Relations Board."

It then proceeds to tell how the National Labor Relations Act should be amended, as follows:

"The National Labor Relations Act requires responsible amendment alike in the interest of American workers and in the interest of a productive functioning of American enterprise. The objective of such amendment must be to maintain without wavering a firm guaranty of the right of free organization and collective bargaining while so revising the provisions and procedures and so altering the spirit of the administration of the act as to surround the whole employee-employer relationship with a sense of complete fairness to all parties and all interests concerned."

We confess that a little more detail might be helpful to the draftsman of the proposed amendment.

Its stand on wage and hour legislation is peculiarly emphatic. it does not think that we ought to have such legislation unless necessary. It presents a splendid formula for the proper wage level. It says that:

"Obviously the healthiest wage level, both for American workers and for American enterprise, is the level at which maximum employment can be maintained at the highest feasible yearly income for the largest possible number of employable workers."

If the committee had given us some inkling as to how this perfect ideal can be realized, every worker in America would be duly grateful to it. The entire chapter on labor is similarly vague and general in its language. No legislation is suggested and no criticism is made of any legislation enacted except the National Labor Relations Act, and that criticism has already been referred to. The report definitely does not advocate the repeal of that act.

The report manifests deep interest in the farmer. It says that the farm problem, when stripped to its essentials, is:

"(1) The problem of so handling, disposing of, or preventing farm surpluses that farm prices will not be wrecked by an unsalable oversupply; and (2) the problem of bringing the prices the farmer gets for what he sells into a sounder relation to the prices he pays for what he buys."

Again, unfortunately, no sort of practical suggestion is made as to how this may be accomplished. No new legislation is proposed and no old legislation is criticized. It says that the farmer's market ought to be expanded and that it would be a good thing to find further industrial use for the farmer's products. It approves of soil conservation, crop loans, and orderly marketing, and it gives the sage advice that in developing the program for the farmer the Government should "open-mindedly consider both the policies that are sound for the long haul and policies that are inescapable for the short haul, and undertake so to relate its permanent policies and its emergency policies that practical progress for the farmer will be realized and long-run dangers be reduced to the minimum." This, I concede, is a perfect gem of an idea.

With respect to business, Dr. Frank gives us this sage advice:

"It is clear to this committee that the best interests of the American people require that we preserve and modernize our traditional system of free enterprise with the minimum governmental regulation necessary to prevent abuse and promote justice in its operation. If the nature of the business system largely determines what government has to do about it, and if we are to proceed on the basis of an intelligently modernized system of free enterprise, then it becomes important to know what the basic characteristics of a free-enterprise system are and at what points, if any, it has been perverted or blocked in the United States. Otherwise we have no dependable basis of judgment on what government should do respecting either business regulation or business reform."

Further on he makes it plain that government intervention in business is here to stay, and that good intervention is good and bad intervention is bad. Something like Calvin Coolidge's daily column that usually informed us that work was desirable, thrift a virtue, and honesty a good thing. We are told that new enterprise must not be controlled; that regulation ought to stimulate rather than repress; that government ought not to compete with business except where it ought to compete. And, again, not a line of legislation is suggested in aid of business, nor is the repeal of any demanded.

In the chapter dealing with fiscal program it is said that the Budget should be balanced as soon as possible. The excess-profits tax is criticized. Social-security taxes are referred to as having imposed a fixed charge on enterprise, but no suggestion is made that they should be abandoned. It is recommended that consideration should be given to the segregation of the tax structure; that all tax exemptions should be eliminated from future issues of State, Federal, and municipal securities.

Of course, we know that that has been advocated by Senator BYRD ever since he has been in public life. It is further recommended that there be some reduction in the higher, individual surtax rates, repeal of the capital stock and excess-profits taxes, and the abolition of the normal tax on dividends, and it suggests that if new levies be desired it should be raised by increases on income in the middle brackets. It further recommends a substantial reduction of governmental expenditures; repeal of the emergency monetary powers of the President, and return to a fixed gold standard. In one breath it advocates the discontinuance of long-time loans of the Government and in the next breath approves of mortgage banks established on capital supplied by the Government to deal in farm and home mortgages. It says that public-works expenditures undertaken as an aid to recovery are proper and useful if they are made under such conditions as the program committee approves. It will be seen that in this section of the report some definite legislation is recommended, particularly changes in the tax structure, and with respect to the currency.

Under the caption "Towards a Social Program" it seems to me that the program definitely approves what the Democratic administration has done along this line, although expressing some criticism of the details. It agrees that social objectives are beyond partisanship; that relief is a responsibility of the Government; that there should be old-age pensions, unemployment compensation, a definite housing program, a public-health service. It states its general position as follows:

"This committee believes, without reservation, as it has said, that modern society must fully protect against privation any of its citizens unemployed through no fault of their own until recovery from abnormal depression conditions makes their reemployment possible. It regards relief, however, as a temporary protection against the destructive effects of unemployment, not as a permanent substitute for employment. It believes, therefore, that a realistic relief policy will be rooted in three considerations: (1) Relief to the suffering, the needy, and the unemployed as long as necessary; (2) self-respecting jobs at fair wages as soon as possible; and (3) the active rehabilitation of the unemployed so they will be equipped to step promptly back into productive employment as soon as full recovery is realized."

It does not point out abuses under the relief program of the administration, but, nevertheless, it asserts that relief has cost too much.

This concludes the report, except its own "conclusion." That conclusion contains this explanatory paragraph:

"The four principles by which the conclusions of this report have been tested are: (1) a balanced representative government, (2) a protectively regulated system of free enterprise, (3) a workable economics of plenty, and (4) an inviolate code of civil liberties supported by political and economic circumstances which make the practice of these liberties possible."

I should certainly advise every Democrat to read the report in full, if possible. I think it would be splendid if the Democratic National Committee would circulate it throughout the United States. It would afford more amusement than Joe Miller's joke book. It contains 115 printed pages, exclusive of the letter of transmittal. Its criticism of Democratic policies are couched in the most general phrases. Its suggestions of its own attitude are platitudinous and solemn pronouncements, without meat or meaning. It almost completely avoids taking a definite position in any controversial matter and suggests no legislation, except the few proposals I have referred to. Remember, please, that it was designed to be the final word in the way of a complete indictment of more than 7 years of Democratic administration. It was supposed that it would get down to cases and point out where and wherein the administration has erred in its policies and wherein improvements could be made. One who reads it is bound to conclude that "The mountain labored and brought forth a mouse." I submit that those who signed this report are a substantial group of witnesses for the soundness and the beneficiality of the Democratic program. If a group of detectives, looking for trouble, can develop nothing more than Dr. Frank and his associates, I think we may well assume that "All is well in Israel."

The Glenn Frank committee and other critics of the administration remind me very much of the man referred to by Postmaster General Farley in one of his many speeches. He said a certain fellow sat by and watched the building of the first automobile, and while its construction was in progress, persistently shook his head and confidently said it could not be built. The automobile was finally finished, the motor in place, the chassis set up, the wheels attached, and the machinery apparently perfect in theory according to the blue prints, but the doubting Thomas still shook his head and said, "It will never run; you just can't get the engine to start; it just won't do," and then the gasoline was poured into the tank, the driver cranked the new contraption, as was required in those days, the spark struck, and the gasoline motor began to turn over and run. The doubter still shook his head and said, "Well, maybe you have got it started, but it won't pull. You can't get it to go around the block. It will stop before you get to the corner." The driver put in his clutch, meshed his gears, the automobile started off slowly at first and then at high speed and went, not only around the block, but many blocks. The doubting Thomas was not convinced. "It will give out in a day or two," he said, "the machinery cannot stand the pressure you put on it. It will be a pile of junk within a week." But the automobile continued to run, continued to serve its owner, continued to be a means of travel from point to point, until the doubting Thomas was finally convinced that it was practical. Did he show any spirit of humility at a demonstration of his erroneous judgment? Not at all. As soon as he was convinced that the automobile would go and go permanently, he walked up to the driver and said, "Get out and let somebody run the damn thing that knows how." That, in effect, is the attitude of the program committee and the Republican opposition to the administration program. They are afraid to oppose its theories and its practices, but they insist that they ought to run it.

I think I have a right to demand a verdict at your hands upon the testimony of these adverse witnesses.

Having submitted the evidence of my hostile witnesses, I would like to refer to one that I am not prepared to say is hostile, but I should hardly think is a Democratic partisan. In the April issue of the Magazine of Wall Street there was an article by a well-known authority, from which I quote:

"The significant fact is that we approximated our 1929 income in both 1936 and 1937, that we exceeded it in 1939, and that we have a good chance of exceeding it again this year. Of course, we are not talking of national income in terms of dollars. With the cost of living at one level, an income of $50 a week can have a purchasing power as great as an income of $75 would have at a higher level of living costs."

In other words, the American people have a real purchasing power equal to that which prevailed in the most wildly speculative year of the country's existence; that is to say, that the same degree of prosperity had been realized without the business inflation.

This same writer said that 100 corporations listed on the exchange earned greater profits in 1939 than they did in the so-called boom year of 1929. The Associated Press has recently reported that the first 250 corporations to report their income for the initial quarter of 1940 show earnings 50 percent above those for the same period for last year, and yet we are told that the Democratic administration has taken the profit motive out of industry.

I again insist that I am entitled to a verdict.

I shall not undertake to go into details with respect to all of the accomplishments of the Democratic administration. Two only, that I regard of vital interest, will receive some detailed attention.

RESULTS OF THE NEUTRALITY POLICY

The central objective of the foreign policy of the United States under the present administration has been the preservation of the peace and security of the Nation. In pursuance of this objective, the Government has sought in every appropriate way to exert moral influence in favor of establishment and strengthening of order under law in relations among nations as the most effective way of prevention of war. Fully conscious of the fact that these efforts might fail, the Government has sought to create defensive military forces adequate to safeguard the security of this country. It has also sought to devise neutrality legislation designed to reduce the risks of involvement in war if war should unhappily occur.

The first legislation of this kind was enacted in 1935. It was revised in 1936, in 1937, and again in 1939. Up to the time of the last revision, the neutrality legislation contained an inflexible embargo on the export of arms to belligerents.

When this arms embargo was first enacted, Secretary Hull warned against the dangers for our national security which were inherent in this type of policy. As time went on, it became increasingly clear that the arms embargo policy, without adding anything to the security of this country, was an encouragement to heavily arming nations intent on conquest and aggression. In view of existing circumstances, the arms embargo policy was, in reality, unneutral.

When, early in 1939, consideration was given to the revision of existing neutrality legislation, Secretary Hull emphasized that the involvement of the United States in controversies with belligerents was most likely to arise from the destruction of American lives—and not from the sale of arms—and that we could effectively diminish our risks only by keeping American nationals and vessels out of areas of special danger. He recommended, therefore, that the arms embargo be repealed and suggested enactment or reenactment of the following provisions which he believed would help to keep the United States out of war: (1) To prohibit American vessels from entering combat areas; (2) to restrict travel by American citizens in combat areas; (3) to provide that the export of goods destined for belligerents should be preceded by transfer of title to the foreign purchaser; (4) to continue the existing legislation respecting loans and credits to nations at war; and (5) to regulate the solicitation and collection of funds for belligerents.

Throughout the summer and autumn Secretary Hull steadfastly advocated these principles. After the outbreak of the European war in September 1939, the public rallied to the support of this neutrality program. The program was substantially enacted by the Congress in a resolution approved by the President on November 4, 1939. Upon the enactment of that resolution, the Secretary said that our first and most sacred task was to keep the United States secure and at peace, and that the new Neutrality Act would greatly assist in this undertaking.

The Neutrality Act of 1939 has now been in operation 7 months. It has fully justified the hopes of its proponents. Since its enactment we have been able to avoid dangerous controversies with belligerents. No American lives are known to have been lost on the high seas as a result of belligerent operations. Furthermore, no American vessel has been destroyed as a result of belligerent activity, although many vessels of other neutral countries have been sunk in the war areas. Thus, as a consequence of the Neutrality Act, we have avoided the destruction of American lives and American vessels, which in other times has resulted in serious controversies with belligerents.

Even though the movements of American merchant vessels have been circumscribed, our merchant marine has not, up to the present, suffered great hardship as a consequence of the Neutrality Act. American shipping companies were compelled to abandon temporarily some of their valuable trade routes, but subsequently advantageous use for their vessels was found elsewhere. Today most of the American merchant vessels are again busily employed in passenger and freight traffic.

Certainly this legislation urged on the Congress by the President has not endangered America's business. For that matter, it has definitely kept it out of Europe's wars. If war comes, it will be a war of self-defense and not brought about by entangling our affairs with those of Europe.

GAINS TO THE UNITED STATES FROM THE RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM

The reciprocal trade agreements program constitutes the first realistic, scientific, and effective approach to the tariff angle of the foreign-trade problem of the United States. Its purpose is to increase that trade and thereby enlarge and maintain both foreign and domestic markets for American products. It thus helps American farmers and creates jobs for American workers. In this manner it increases the entire Nation's buying power for the products of American farms and factories.

This program utilizes the experience of technically trained experts in the Government departments concerned with the commercial policy of the United States—the Departments of State, Commerce, Agriculture, the Treasury, and the United States Tariff Commission. It constitutes the first tariff-making program in which these technical services have been used effectively. The program replaces the old logrolling methods of tariff making which always resulted in piecemeal and unscientific establishment of higher and higher tariff rates through the activities of self-seeking pressure groups. These old methods came into full flower in connection with the embargo Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930.

Between 1929 and 1932, after the Hawley-Smoot tariff had been in operation for 2½ years, this country's national income fell by more than $42,000,000,000, or more than half; the value of United States foreign trade declined from $9,600,000,000 to $2,900,000,000; export of United States farm products dropped from a value of $1,700,000,000 in 1929 to $662,000,000 in 1932; United States farm cash income dropped from $11,200,000,000 in 1929 to $4,700,000,000 in 1932.

The Hawley-Smoot tariff was a principal cause of a rise of unprecedented trade restrictions everywhere. When these excessive barriers choked world trade channels, American workmen lost jobs, American farm surpluses became dammed up, and American farm and other prices were forced to disastrously low levels.

During the more than 5 years prior to the outbreak of the new war in Europe the reciprocal trade agreements program was effective in clearing away thousands of tariff and other obstructions from world trade channels. It contributed materially to the increase in volume of our foreign commerce, which, in turn, was an important factor in the improvement of the economic situation of American farmers and workers. Trade agreements have been negotiated with 21 countries, which accounted for nearly two-thirds of total United States foreign trade.

By 1939, after 5½ years of the operation of the trade-agreements program, the following increases, as compared with 1933, took place in some of the principal factors of our national prosperity:

	Increase
	Amount	Percent
United States total foreign trade	$2,370,000,000	76
United States exports	1,502,000,000	90
United States imports	868,000,000	60
United States national income	25,996,000,000	61
United States farm cash income (excluding Government payments)	2,433,000,000	46
Wages and salaries in manufacturing industries	5,137,000,000	69

Effectiveness of the trade-agreements program as a major factor among those which brought about these increases is demonstrated by the fact that United States trade with the countries with which we have trade agreements has increased far more rapidly than has trade with nonagreement countries. Our exports to the countries covered by the 18 agreements in effect throughout the year 1939 averaged 50.5 percent greater in 1938–39 than in 1934–35, while our exports to all other countries increased by only 31.7 percent.

The trade-agreement method of operating to increase foreign trade is that of bargaining with individual foreign countries for reductions in their tariffs or other barriers against specific United States export products which we have in abundance, making, in return, reductions in excessive United States tariffs on products of foreign countries which American industries and American consumers need and want. The tariff concessions which the United States may grant in an agreement are strictly limited by the law itself and are safeguarded by provisions formulated by the Government experts with a view to preventing serious injury to established domestic producers.

Through the agreements the United States has obtained from foreign countries concessions on hundreds of American farm and factory goods produced for export. Concessions in effect on January 1, 1940, applied to products which in 1937 made up 30.3 percent of our total exports and included 47.3 percent of our 1937 farm exports and 24.9 percent of our nonagricultural exports in the same year.

War has not wiped out the gains made in the preceding 5 years through the reciprocal trade-agreements program. It is true that measures taken by certain foreign countries for the purpose of strengthening their war effort, or with a view to counteracting the effects of war on their trade, have resulted in the temporary suspension of certain detailed provisions of our trade agreements with belligerent countries and have restricted the immediate opportunities for negotiating new agreements. The nature of our wartime trade with foreign countries is different in many respects from what it was in time of peace, but notwithstanding the effects of war—

(1) The trade agreements now in effect provide a basis and a mechanism for maintaining the best commercial relations possible under existing circumstances;

(2) The authority under the Trade Agreements Act and the interdepartmental technical organization set up to administer the program are available for making quick and sound decisions and for taking effective action to meet the new and urgent problems of world trade in wartime; and

(3) The principles of equal treatment and of mutually beneficial trade relations among all nations embodied in the trade agreements program remain the soundest possible foundation for establishing a satisfactory postwar world economy. They are an indispensable foundation for stable and enduring peace among nations.

This last point is of special importance. Steadfast adherence to the principles of a liberal economic policy in international relations—even though, in the light of existing conditions, some temporary deviations might be necessary—is an essential part of the defense and promotion of our best national interest. Only if these principles come to prevail in the relations among nations will there be any hope for enduring peace and satisfactory prosperity for our Nation and for all nations.

May I add to this discussion of the reciprocal-trade agreements a brief word of defense to the charge that the Hull trade-treaty program (because this program has been the pet child of Secretary of State Cordell Hull) in some instances has caused an increase in imports, the inference being that American business has lost trade by reason of that fact. In discussing this matter, I quote from the report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, which recommended the extension of authority to negotiate and conclude such agreements. The report touching this point said:

"This leads straight to the vital point which the opposing testimony continuously failed to recognize—namely, that the condition of the American markets rather than the small proportion supplied by imports is the important consideration. To put it in simple form, it is far better to have a somewhat smaller proportion of a good market than a larger proportion of a poor one. A former member of this committee stated the situation forcefully in the House debate on the trade-agreements resolution in 1937 when he asked which the critics of the trade agreements would rather have—95 percent of something or 100 percent of nothing. For example, the producers of Cheddar cheese, who complained about the tariff reduction on such cheese in the first Canadian agreement, had 99.84 percent of the domestic market in 1932, following passage of the Hawley-Smoot Act, but were getting only about 10 cents a pound for cheese and had a gross income of about $37,000,000 in that year. In 1936, the first year of the Canadian agreement, they had 2 percent less (97.78 percent) of the domestic market than in 1932, but they got an average of 15.3 cents a pound for their cheese and received a gross income of $75,000,000.

"To take an industrial illustration: In 1931, 7,700,000 pounds of window glass were imported; in 1937, imports had increased to 46,000,000 pounds, or sixfold. But what was the situation with respect to domestic production in these years? In 1931, 347,000,000 pounds, valued at $10,400,000 of window glass was produced in the United States; in 1937 the domestic production had increased to 851,000,000 pounds, valued at $31,400,000. In other words, the domestic producers in 1931 supplied 97.8 percent of a poor market and in 1937, a smaller percent (94.9) of a much better market."

CONCLUSION

And, now, having discussed the issues upon which we believe our party can appeal with confidence to the American people, and particularly the people of Virginia, my task is over.

I do not feel that it is a part of my function to attempt to choose between proposed or prospective candidates, or to prophesy or advise either this convention or the national convention at Chicago as to its choice of standard bearers. There is an abundance of material.

However, the point I wish to stress is that whatever may be the result of the convention at Chicago, many of us may be disappointed with that result. But earnestly I implore you that that should make no difference in our attitude toward the party nominee. I voted for Bryan in 1908, for Wilson in 1912 and in 1916, for Cox in 1920, for Davis in 1924, for Al Smith in 1928, and for Roosevelt in 1932 and 1936. I have never run my pencil through the name of a Democratic nominee, National, State, or local, and I don't propose to begin that practice in 1940. Whoever the nominees of the Chicago convention are I shall support them and so will the overwhelming majority of the Democrats of Virginia. When these nominations are made the orders will come: "Fall in" and the militant hosts of Virginia Democrats will take their position in solid columns without a straggler missing. "Right shoulder arms," and every musket will be in proper position. "Forward march," the Democratic army will start their advance that will not end until November 5, when every soldier shall cast a vote for the national ticket, for HARRY BYRD for United States Senator, and for at least one of the nine Democratic nominees for Congress in Virginia. In that march, I suggest that the general order will be, "Don't shoot, boys, until you see the whites of their eyes, but when you do, give them hell."

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement showing the recent progress of national defense in both the Army and the Navy from 1934 to 1940.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECENT DEFENSE PROGRESS

ARMY

Between 1934 and 1940, the Regular Army was raised from 134,000 officers and men to 242,648 officers and men. During the same period the National Guard was raised from a strength of 189,000 to 251,000.

NAVY

Since 1933 more ships have been built and commissioned than the number of under-age ships at the beginning of 1933. During 1933–40 eight times as many combatant ships were built as in the previous 7 years. Naval personnel was increased over 60 percent. Some illustrative figures follow:

United States Navy

	1934	1940
Ships under age	84 of 708,550 tons	134 of 929,070 tons.
Ships building	47 of 152,760 tons	77 of 488,860 tons.
Ships over age	288 of 330,110 tons	235 of 328,290 tons.

Under present authorizations, we shall have 617 ships of 2,611,670 tons—the world's greatest fleet.

Air forces

	1934	1940
Navy	933	1,765
Army	1,497	2,800

STRATEGIC RAW MATERIALS

A $100,000,000 program of building up stocks of strategic raw materials was started over a year ago. Over $10,000,000 worth of these essentials for national defense have already been purchased.

DEFENSE CONSTRUCTION

Over 12,000 military and naval buildings and 500 landing fields were constructed or improved under W. P. A. projects 1935–40. The W. P. A. performed work on three-fourths of all Army posts. One hundred thousand men were employed on national defense W. P. A. projects in June 1940.

The P. W. A. in 5 years allotted $861,750,464 directly to the War and Navy Departments and the Coast Guard. The P. W. A. completed 383 airport construction projects.

DEFENSE LOANS

On June 25, the President signed a bill which empowered the R. F. C. to make loans for defense-plant construction and raw-material purchases. By July 31, 22 loans totaling $287,546,340 had been made.

LABOR IN DEFENSE

(a) On July 31, 4 weeks after the defense vocational training program was started, 70,000 people were taking training courses in defense skills in vocational high schools. This number was increasing at the rate of 10,000 a week.

(b) The United States Employment Service has made an inventory of 5,000,000 unemployed with a view to using their skills for defense purposes.

(c) Employment in aircraft, machine tool, aluminum, and explosive industries shows the following trends:

1937 average	195,500
April 1940	282,500
May 1940	294,900
June 1940	316,900

RECENT ARMY CONTRACTS

During the period between June 6 and July 17, the National Defense Advisory Commission cleared $1,650,000,000 worth of Army and Navy contracts.

A contract for the construction and operation of a Government powder plant has been signed, although it was not until 7 months after we were at war in 1917 that such a contract was signed.

The Defense Commission has announced that it will have an emergency plan for the production of synthetic rubber ready within a few weeks, that 500 Garand rifles will be delivered daily by October 1, that by December 31, 25,000 trucks will be delivered, and that 25,000 planes will be produced yearly by 1942. At the present time, 900 planes are being delivered monthly. There will be 1,500 monthly by the fall.

Many of the activities of the Commission have not yet been made public.

EXPORT CONTROL

Arms have been exported only under license for several years. Recently, measures have been taken to prevent export of materials necessary to national defense.

AIRPLANE PILOT TRAINING

About 14,000 young men are now being trained as pilots under the Civil Aeronautics Board. During the past school year some 10,000 were trained. There will be 15,000 new trainees in September, and another 15,000 in February.

American Defense Meeting of Harvard Summer School

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 5, 1940

ADDRESS BY PROF. SIDNEY POST SIMPSON

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Prof. Sidney Post Simpson, of Harvard Law School, before the American defense meeting of the Harvard summer school on July 30 of this year.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, men and women of the Harvard Summer School, not so long ago these things we are talking about tonight would have sounded to most of us like a fairy story. Perhaps it would have begun like this: Once upon a time, in the year 1940, there was a very rich country. It was relatively free. It was relatively prosperous. It was devoted to the arts of peace. It had most of the gold in the world. It had most of the coal and iron. It had most of the oil. It had grown rich and sure of its own external security. Many of its people were mainly absorbed with making money and with securing material comfort. But it had churches, schools, colleges, universities, and it cherished a tradition of the freedom and dignity of man and the maintenance of certain elemental human decencies.

Three thousand miles away, across a great ocean, were some countries something like it—less rich, mostly less free, some smaller countries perhaps more free. But there were other countries, too; countries which had ordered the lives of their people on quite a different plan. For relative freedom they substituted organized constraint. For the arts of peace they substituted the art of war. In their relations with other countries they employed a diplomacy based on propaganda and an equal readiness to make or to break promises in order to reach a desired end. For the human decencies habitually observed in other countries they substituted different ways of doing things.

One of them in particular was a very efficient country, and it devoted its efficiency to developing the art of war. It had an extremely ambitious leader. That leader, indeed, was so ambitious that most people in the other countries could not comprehend his ambition, even though he had put it all in a book. They thought that he was looking for more ultimate comfort for his people, for more territory, for a more adequate share of the world's raw materials, for revenge on enemies. He was looking for these things. But he was also looking for more, and so were his people—and the mass of his people were squarely behind him, partly by reason of a new system of education, and partly by reason of a drastic means of dealing with those who disagreed. He was even able to persuade the women of his people to accept a definitely inferior position in his country's scheme, and he was able to enlist the enthusiastic aid of many of his people in cruel racial and religious persecutions. He and his people were looking for power. His and their desires for power were not limited, any more than were those of Alexander, or of the Caesars, or of Napoleon. To be sure, most people in the other countries could not, or would not, understand this. But such was the fact. This country was seeking to dominate the world—not part of the world, but all of the world.

So this particular country set out on its career of world conquest. It was a comparatively small country, half the size of its great, rich neighbor 3,000 miles across the sea. It had been crushed in a war not many years before. The terms of the peace imposed upon it had been harsh, in some respects unjust, and in many respects unwise. After this peace this country had been bankrupt, and very unhappy. But when this leader came into power he was able in 6 years to undertake his career of conquest, and in 1 more year he and his people dominated, or were about to dominate, a continent. One by one, the less powerful first, the countries nearest were reduced to submission, sometimes by deception, sometimes by force, sometimes without resistance.

In the meantime, the great, rich country across the sea attended to the arts of peace and sought to help its people be happy; and, while it did not succeed perfectly, it had begun to succeed pretty well. But it did not realize that it was in any danger. It played games, especially a game called politics, and it got very soft and very defenseless. Then, one day after it saw one smaller country after another fall into the hands of a conqueror, it began to wake up. But then it was very nearly too late. The country was large, it was thought by its enemies—and not without reason—to be disunited, and it still wanted to play the game called politics. Its people used little words, like "Republican" and "Democrat" and "New Deal" and "third term" and "underprivilege" and "C. I. O." and "A. F. L.," and "American business." It had forgotten to think in terms of big words, like "our country" and "American ideals," and it did not like to think at all of two very big and terrible words, "war" and "invasion." And there seemed only one answer to what would happen.

Is there only one answer? That is the question that the United States must face, and face without any delay. I ask you to face it with me tonight, without fear, but without self-deception.

Let us first examine the basis of the policy of which we have heard so much—that the United States must keep out of war. It is based on the assumption of a fact. Unless that fact is true, that policy is mere words. The fact which that policy assumes is that there is no practical possibility of a successful attack on the continental United States.

There are three questions which we must ask. First, is an attack on the United States possible, as a technical military question? Second, if such an attack is possible, is it likely to be attempted? Third, do we want to prevent it? Let us consider each of these questions.

The answer to the first question is clear. It is "yes." A totalitarian attack on the United States is a military possibility. While the considerations that compel that answer are technical military consideration, they are intelligible enough. Let me direct your attention to four things and you can draw your own conclusions.

First, the German strategy beginning in Poland, then in Norway, then in Flanders, and most recently—so far—in France is a new kind of strategy. It is fundamentally based, not on defeating opposing armies directly, but on attack of rear areas and on attemps to break down the morale of the civil population. It is not like the older strategy which primarily contemplated the occupation and holding of territory. It operates rather in terms of paralyzing the adversary's circulatory and nervous systems.

Second, to carry out such a strategy, where the primary purpose is destruction rather than occupation, with occupation coming later when the opposing army is paralyzed or civil morale broken, does not require large bodies of troops. Irretrievable destruction can be accomplished by comparatively small numbers of determined men, and these people I am talking about are very determined men. The parachute corps of the German army has been recruited by volunteering. It is a suicide assignment and it is known to be such. And yet it has been impossible to accept anywhere near all the men who have volunteered for that service.

Third, in past wars the assumption has been that a military force must keep open a line of retreat. That assumption, with respect to the present German Army, can no longer be made. With their strategy, and with their troops, soldiers can be sent out to do their mission of destruction—and they need not return. Hitherto our consideration of the possible vulnerability of the United States to air attack, even taking into account the geographical location of our munition plants and our industries—all now above ground—and the ease with which the complicated organization of our great cities—as for example the water supply, power plants, and transportation centers serving Boston, New York, and Philadelphia—could be disorganized, has been proceeding on the theory that planes must get here and back. Leave out the "and back," and the picture is different. Fourth, the Atlantic Clipper is now flying, nonstop, from Horta, in the Azores, to New York; heavy bombers are being delivered in England by flying them from Newfoundland; the United States Navy has just ordered patrol bombers with a cruising range of 5,000 miles. While we do not know what large long-range airplanes the Germans have built, there are persistent rumors of some large enough to carry 15-ton tanks by air, which seem confirmed at least as to possibility by recent Russian air transport of tanks in Rumania. Of course, no one with military experience supposes that such tank-carrying planes would, in the event of a Nazi attack on the United States, be used to carry tanks. Their lifting capacity would be used rather for gasoline to get them across the Atlantic, and for suicide squads of soldiers with orders to destroy munitions plants, airplane factories, and vital establishments in our big cities on the Atlantic coast. And if anyone in the United States thinks that these things indicate merely a threat to our Eastern seaboard, let them remember the large extent of German interpenetration in Mexico and South America which has already been accomplished, and let them also consider the unenviable position of the Pacific coast if it becomes necessary to transfer the American Battle Fleet to the Atlantic.

Some of you may be wondering, perhaps, what the effect of this kind of an attack would be. It might have several effects. First, it might break civil morale in a large part of the country, very important strategically and industrially, to an extent where an olive branch would be held out to the Army. If you do not believe that this can happen where sufficient havoc is wrought on the civil population, especially women and children, consider Leopold's surrender of the Belgian Army. Second, such an attack would involve large loss of investments by a number of wealthy men, and some of them might try to hold out the olive branch. Third, and perhaps most important, an attack of this sort—eliminating essential munitions plants in New England, New York, and New Jersey—would delay this country's preparedness plans by many months. When you may have to face an opponent who runs "blitzkriegs," this is too long a delay to be risked.

If an attack on America is militarily practicable, as it is, may it be attempted? Here again let me call your attention to some concrete facts. One fact is the character of the ambition of Nazi Germany, and its systematic refusal to be hampered by considerations of humaneness or honor. Another is the real and inescapable conflict of interest, both material and ideological, between the United States and the Germany of Hitler. This, indeed may very well be a case where, not the country, but the world, cannot exist half slave and half free. Moreover, this country is a rich prize in its own right—a far richer prize than any of the other countries which thus far have been subjected to German military and economic domination. Even if the United States had undertaken to appease the dictators and had refused material aid to France and England, it would still have been in certain danger.

This brings up the third question: Do we want to prevent an attack on the United States? I heard a man say in New York City the other day that he would rather have Hitler than Roosevelt. I don't think that he really would, and I am sure that he did not have the slightest idea of what that would actually mean. This particular man was engaged in business—fairly big business. I suppose he had not heard of the fate of Fritz Thyssen, who was the Henry Ford of Germany not so many years ago. I suppose that he had not realized that the fate of businessmen in Germany, large and small, even before the outbreak of the present war, has been to carry out the orders of the National Socialist Party—without assurance of profit, at their own expense, under penalty of removal to concentration camps or being put to work as day laborers wherever labor might be needed if they did not comply to the party's satisfaction. Indeed, I wonder how many of us have considered realistically what this Nazi system means. I think American labor has. Labor knows that the domination of the Nazi system would mean the end of trade-unions, of collective bargaining, and of all the things that they have worked and hoped for. Some of the rest of us, however, have not been so wise. Many of us who, like myself, have come from the Farm Belt of the Middle West have not realized that the German farmer and the farmers in the countries conquered by Germany have been tied to the land, they and their children, like medieval serfs under penalty of confiscation and the concentration camp if they leave it. I do think that most of us in the educational field have realized the utter change in the educational system which has taken place in Germany and is now taking place in the conquered countries—the substitution of dictated dogma for search after truth; the substitution of indoctrination for free inquiry. Some of us may have realized what has happened to the young people in Germany and the conquered countries—the changing of young men into war machines and young women into birth machines.

Again, we in this country have been developing—imperfectly enough, but increasingly—the principle that men and women are equal partners in the things that this country needs to do. Contrast that with the situation in Germany and in the conquered countries, where woman's place in the social order is definitely an inferior one—her only significant functions being the wholesale production of children in or out of wedlock, and, to use Nietzsche's phrase, the "amusement of the warrior."

But surely further emphasis on what Nazi domination involves is unnecessary with this audience. To you and in this place, surely I need do no more than mention our country's historic struggles toward an expanding ideal of freedom, our American devotion to Christianity and the freedom of all religions, and our American reluctance to become a subject race. We do want to prevent any attack on the United States.

Thus, when we face the actual situation, the supposed fact that has been the basis for all this talk about America keeping out of the war dissolves. The question is not whether we can keep America out of war but whether we can keep war out of America. There was much talk in recent months about "not sending our boys to die in France." No one has ever wanted our boys to die in France or anywhere else—but certainly, if it should be necessary to defend the United States, it would have been better if we had been able to do so in France rather than in Massachusetts, or New York, or California, or Illinois. No one wants Boston or New York City or Chicago bombed as Rotterdam and Warsaw and Bordeaux were, and as England is now being bombed. Surely, too, we do not want to take any chances that our high command may have to consider whether to make a stand on the line of the Connecticut River or withdraw to the line of the Hudson—or farther west.

In any case, talk about America's now sending troops abroad is foolish. Our whole Regular Army ready for active service in the continental United States is about one-fourth the size of what was the Army of the Netherlands.

You will think I am painting a dark picture. I am. That is the picture. Some of you may think that I am an alarmist, but I ask you, if you think so, to search your consciences and ask yourselves if you are not thinking that way because that is the way you want to think. In military operations—and the present situation is in essence a military operation forced upon the United States by other powers—it is necessary to consider not only what potential enemies are most likely to do, but what is the most dangerous thing that they can do, and then it is necessary to take sufficient and prompt steps to meet that most dangerous possibility. If we disregard what can happen, and prepare only to meet what is most likely to happen, we will be in the same situation as the British and Norwegians who thought a few months ago, for very good reasons, that a difficult pass in Norway could not be crossed by a Nazi mechanized force.

The importance of this basic principle for American defense plans cannot be too much emphasized. This country must prepare for all possible eventualities, even—indeed, especially—for those which at the moment seem on the whole somewhat unlikely. The Nazi technique for the conduct of war is based largely on the factor of surprise, and one of the most effective means of producing military surprise is to do the thing that the opposing country or army thinks is unlikely. Some persons seem to take the view that this country may safely limit itself to preparing against the more probable courses of totalitarian attack—but that way lies disaster. To say, for example, that we need only concern ourselves with preventing the establishment of enemy land bases in this hemisphere because an air attack on the eastern seaboard would be unlikely to come until after such bases were established, to invite a different kind of attack. Moreover, it is essential to prepare first to meet the kind of attack which can come soonest, and also to remember that even if an attack of a particular kind might not ultimately result in permanent occupation of American territory, there is no reason for courting destruction of our cities and industries and death of our people, both in the armed forces and in civil life, merely because we hope an invader could later be expelled.

The most dangerous immediate military possibility, probably, is some such form of direct air attack on our cities and industrial plants as I have suggested. But there are other possibilities fully as dangerous, and perhaps more likely even if less immediate. A successful German invasion of Great Britain and Ireland might involve the loss or surrender of the British Navy. It might involve the removal of the British Government to Canada. It might involve German domination of the other British possessions near us in South America, Central America, and the West Indies. Indeed, we are now confronted with similar if less serious problems with respect to the French possessions in this hemisphere, and with respect to Iceland and Greenland.

Again, we are only now beginning to realize fully the extent of Nazi activities south of the Rio Grande. There is now evidence that there are more armed and equipped Germans in South America than there are soldiers in our entire Regular Army. There are large German airlines in the Argentine and further north, with many commercial planes which could be readily converted for military use. And we must not forget that effective development of German air bases in Colombia and especially in Mexico would mean that the Middle West and the Pacific Coast would be as open to air attacks as the eastern seaboard now is.

To consider another aspect of the whole picture, the Far Eastern situation is loaded with dynamite. Even from a purely economic standpoint, Japanese seizure of the Netherlands Indies would be a serious matter for us, and vulnerability of the Philippines as well as their usefulness to Japan are familiar enough facts? If Japan is allowed to dominate eastern Asia and the South Seas, and thus can exclude American trade except on her own terms, there will be real trouble for us economically, to say nothing of the possibility of a German-Italian-Japanese military alliance for an attack on America from several directions, nor of the uncertain attitude of Russia.

These are not all the possibilities, but they are some of the more serious. And let me emphasize again that none can be disregarded, and that the most immediately dangerous must be prepared against immediately. We as a nation and as individuals cannot take any chances on allowing any of these things to happen.

All of which is to say that we are in a very tough spot—a very tough spot, indeed. What can we do to get ourselves out of that spot?

1. We can support immediate and effective measures—military, naval, and industrial—for American defense. Things must be made to move and move fast. This will probably require that our war industries begin to run 24 hours a day. It certainly means that any attempt by any industrial group to make large profits out of preparedness must be dealt with at once and drastically. It means recognition of the principle of universal national service—which can be described as compulsory only for those few who are not willing to join in a united national effort because they hope someone else will do it for them.

There has been much talk about the present selective military service bill from various quarters, but I think the wisest comment I have heard came to me from a man of 20 who is working as a mechanic in a garage in Cambridge, with whom I talked the other night. I asked him what he thought about selective service. He said, "My friends and I are all for it. We don't want to enlist in the Regular Army, because that is no life for a man. We don't want to join the National Guard, because we have heard that it's an antilabor outfit. But we know there may be a fight, and we know that we can't fight the Germans with monkey wrenches. We would like to know how to fight if we have to."

But let me tell you another story which seems to me equally significant. I was talking a few weeks ago with an unemployed union carpenter in a South Boston bar. He said to me: "The reason why most of my friends believe in compulsory service is the same reason most of us believe in the closed shop. Most of us are willing to serve, just like most of us pay union dues—and we don't want to see a few bums who aren't willing get away with something." It seems to me that this story gives the answer to suggestions that our Army should be recruited solely by volunteering. Indeed, these two stories, I think, sum up the whole case for the present selective military service bill. No doubt we must go further than that bill. Perhaps very soon what we should aim for is a real system of universal registration and universal availability for national service without regard to age, class, or sex. I think we all want to make our services available where they can be most useful. Make no mistake, my friends, if we really want to avoid the danger of becoming subject to an alien power, we must prepare ourselves to make serious sacrifices of our time and our wealth, to make them cheerfully, and to be proud of them. Unless our people care enough about our country so that not having been selected for military service is a cause for regret rather than joy, we are very close to disaster.

2. So far as the safety of the United States is concerned, we can stop talking and thinking in political terms. A lot of us have been talking and thinking that way. A lot of us are thinking almost wholly in terms of such words as "Roosevelt" and "Willkie" and "Wallace" and "McNary." Politics may be important, but American defense must transcend politics. Regardless of whom any of us may decide to vote for next November, this is no time to snipe at the Commander in Chief. The same thing will be true after next January regardless of the result of the November election.

3. Let us not fool ourselves as to the issue before our country. That issue is not isolation or intervention. We could not intervene if we would. And we can remain isolated only if and so long as Herr Hitler permits it. The issue is peace—if we want it and will work for it—or a prelude to surrender. But we must work as we have never worked before, and we must all work, and work together. And we must get going now. Talk of preparedness in 1942 is folly; our deadline must be next April or sooner. We cannot afford to wait, as did France and as did England.

4. We can firmly resist movements for appeasement of any totalitarian power, east or west. There are still some people who seem to think as Chamberlain did and as many French politicians did that you can change a man-eating tiger into a house cat by patting it on the head. If and when trouble really starts we must have developed a national morale which will prevent an American Munich.

But you are saying to yourselves, "This is all very general talk. What can I personally do?" At least I hope you are saying that. It seems to me clear that you can do very important things, more important than any of us here at Harvard can do. In less than 2 weeks you will be going back to your schools and your communities—schools and communities which in any realistic assessment of our United States are much more important than Harvard or Cambridge. Some of you are going back to my part of the country, the Middle West. Some of you are going back to the Pacific coast, and some to the South. If we are going to preserve our common country as we have known it—and, with all its imperfections, loved it and hoped to make it better—we must make articulate to 130,000,000 people the things that Mr. Lerner has said so well tonight, the things that I have tried to say, the things Senator PEPPER is going to say, and the things that I know that you think. And we must spare no effort in doing so. This is no time to think about ourselves, our plans, or our personal comfort. This is no time to think about taking vacations or of the pleasanter things of life. The only way that we can get out of the very tough spot this country is now in is by vigorous, united, and immediate effort.

Some of you may be thinking: "He is asking us to spread a gospel." That is just what I am asking. It is the gospel of our country, and it needs to be spread. You, my friends, are in a wonderfully good position to spread it. This little thing of ours called American defense: Harvard Group is just an imperfect pattern. There should be, and I hope there will be, an American-defense group in every school and college and in every city and town in our country. And I know that each of you can, if you will, bring that about in your own community. But these things must be started without delay.

We must realize now that this is a really critical situation; that the next 6 months, or even less, may well be decisive; that a real and visible national unity is immediately essential. It will be a very tough job to win this fight. The way the game is being played now by some of our politicians, we have a beautiful chance of losing. But we can still win if we all act together at once—and we can give our country peace. It will be a hard job, and it may take a long time—but it can be done.

Treatment of American Indians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLE BY CLARENCE DEAN

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Mr. Clarence Dean which appeared in the Hartford Times of Hartford, Conn., on August 2, 1940.

This article contains a bold accusation relating to the treatment of American Indians. I find it hard to believe that the charges contained in the article are accurate, but it has so startled me that I felt that the Members of Congress should be given a chance to read it. Some Senators will know whether or not it is wholly or in part true. If any of it is true, something should be done about it immediately. If we are neglecting the Indians to the extent pointed out in the newspaper story, we are not only guilty of gross injustice but deserving of condemnation.

Just as soon as circumstances permit I myself shall endeavor to make a personal investigation. In the meantime I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues, and particularly those who are representing parts of the country in which Indians reside, a horrifying statement made by a man who professes to have examined the situation, and who appears to be greatly concerned with the welfare of the American Indians. This gentleman is Mr. John E. Hamilton, of Hartford, Conn. I do not know Mr. Hamilton, but his article speaks for itself.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Times of August 2, 1940]

LEAGUE HEAD FINDS DISEASE RAMPANT ON RESERVATIONS

(By Clarence Dean)

"Indescribable misery" among the American Indians on Federal reservations was reported today by John E. Hamilton, of Hartford, president and executive director of the National American Indian Defense Association, Inc.

Mr. Hamilton recently returned from a personal investigation on two Montana reservations, during which he arranged for representatives of the association to carry the investigation into other reservations.

"No one acquainted with the conditions that I saw with my own eyes," Mr. Hamilton declared today, "can doubt that the Bureau of Indian Affairs is both incapable and neglectful.

"I say further that the Bureau has built up a system that lends itself to corruption of all kinds—a system that makes the welfare of the Indian a matter of the least importance. All of this must be charged to the indifference of Congress and the American people."

"I found on the Blackfeet Reservation in Browning, Mont., and the Rocky Boy Reservation in Box Elder," Mr. Hamilton reported, "widespread tuberculosis and trachoma, a disease of the eyes.

"The majority of the Indians are starving and in immediate need of food.

"The taste of fruits, vegetables, and milk are unknown to thousands of these Indians. Very little meat is given to them; salt pork is stale and of the cheapest quality.

"Some of them are fortunate enough to obtain small quantities of flour in doles from the Government agencies. It has been exposed to dust, dirt, mice, and vermin. Lard is rancid. For coffee, they are handed out the green beans.

"Many of them are obliged to walk miles for water, and the water they are able to carry back to their dwellings is of insufficient quantity. It is impossible for them to bathe except when it rains. In winter, they use snow for bathing and drinking.

"They are compelled to live in dilapidated and unsanitary dwellings which they make themselves whenever they can find cardboard; old slabs, clay, reeds, brush, and rocks.

"Because of the lack of nourishment, shelter, and medical attention, the Indians—from the babies to the aged—are subject to all kinds of diseases, particularly tuberculosis and trachoma."

Establishing headquarters on the Blackfeet Reservation, where approximately 4,000 Indians live, Mr. Hamilton reported members of the tribe walked for miles to tell him of their hardships.

"One old woman came to me crying," he said. "She had not eaten, she told me, for days. I was carrying in my pocket a box of graham crackers, and I gave her a handful. She shoved them into her mouth and ate them almost like an animal."

"On the Rocky Boy Reservation there are no floors in the shacks. The Indians sleep on the ground. In winter their only heat is obtained by turning over a tin tub on the ground and building a fire underneath. This fills the tent or shack with smoke and contributes to the prevalence of trachoma.

"The whole administration of Indian affairs is on a hit-or-miss basis. There is no regular allotment of food. A great many of the children receive absolutely no schooling.

"The Indians' plight is the more serious because they have no means, even if physically able, to leave the reservation and find employment. They can obtain no money and are not free to sell their own goods, even if they have any.

"One Indian wrote to me, 'I have about 95 acres in the oil fields and there are 2 producing wells on my place. My brother has 55 acres joining me. It was leased the other day for $200 an acre. They give me $14.34 a year for my share. My brother gets $8.25 a year for his, or 15 cents an acre. This land was allotted to us about in 1910.'

"All the finances of the reservation are in the hands of the superintendent. He receives all moneys and buys all goods and is accountable only to the Indian Commissioner, who is accountable only to the Secretary of the Interior.

"To maintain this guardianship of the American Indian, the Indian Bureau maintains an organization of 10,000 employees—about 1 employee for every 25 Indians.

"The Bureau is wastrel, profligate beyond description. It is a bureaucracy which has grown insidiously like a cancer through its own sinister lust for power and the neglect and indifference of Congress.

"It has multiplied employees and expenses to a staggering total. It has woven a web of laws and rules until every step and act of helpless human beings is subject to a bureau's whims and will. It has repressed protests with an iron hand, violated the inherent constitutional rights of men whose only crime was an honest desire to help a people in bondage.

"It has been imbecile and inefficient in actual performance, wasting with reckless hands the property of the Indians and funds of the American taxpayers.

"The expenses of the Bureau have been greatly augmented during the past few years, the number of employees has been multiplied, and more than one-half of the stupendous sum taken from the Indians and from the Treasury of the United States annually has been consumed by the employees of the Bureau.

"The Bureau has reached the point where the Indians are almost forgotten and the Bureau is its principal excuse for being.

"Because Congress has the exclusive power over tribal Indians, Congress, and the American people must bear the responsibility for permitting these disgraceful conditions to continue. I am sure that most of the indifference is due, especially in the East, to ignorance."

The association that Mr. Hamilton heads is preparing to intensify its efforts for reform through a membership campaign in October. By this time, Mr. Hamilton expects to have still more detailed information on reservation conditions. He invites all persons interested in doing volunteer work during the campaign to communicate with the association at 22 Arnold Street, telephone 6-1187.

Improvement in Business Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLE FROM NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, from time to time during the past several months I have presented to the Senate statements concerning the business situation in the United States. Each time I have tried to present a statement by an authority and printed in a paper or magazine which could not be construed as being prejudiced in favor of this administration. There has been no paper in the country more critical of the administration's domestic policy than the New York Herald Tribune. One of the outstanding financial writers in the country is Roger W. Babson. In view of these two facts it should be of particular interest to have available an article on our business prospects printed in the New York Herald Tribune, written by Mr. Babson. I ask consent that such an article appearing on July 9 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of August 4, 1940]

WIDE UPTURNS SEEN BY BABSON IN SECOND HALF—CLOSING MONTHS MAY BRING BEST BUSINESS IN HISTORY OF NATION, HE PREDICTS

(By Roger W. Babson)

Business in the second half of this year should be very active in most lines—maybe the best final half in history. More real jobs, fatter pay envelopes, modestly higher farm income, bigger dividends than in the first half of 1940 or in the final 6 months of 1939 are assured. There will be no noticeable gain in living costs, but taxes will be the heaviest in a quarter century. The next few months will be a period of intense industrial activity as our mammoth defense program gets under way.

This defense program will put the "oomph" in the industrial boom ahead. If peace comes in Europe before the program gets going full blast, there will be a temporary halt in the upswing. The longer peace is postponed, however, the greater the possibility that business activity will break all previous records sometime in 1940 or 1941. Specifically, I estimate that business in the second half will run about 6 percent above the same period of 1939, and also 6 percent higher than in the first 6 months of this year.

Readers will recall that in my outlook for the first half of 1940 I predicted a gain of 10 to 15 percent over the same months of 1939, but a downward trend from the high levels of January 1. This gain was 11.5 percent and business is 6 percent under the new-year level. I also said that we would have either a boom or a crash (no halfway course) in the second half of the year. I felt that it was impossible at that time to say which it would be. Now, however, I predict for the balance of this year a real boom in most industries.

Pace setter in this industrial expansion ahead will be the heavy industries. Steel operations are scheduled to reach a new peak for any 6-month period on record. They are entering the second half at close to 90 percent of capacity, the highest midsummer figure since 1929. Machine shops, metal foundries, airplane factories, shipyards, railway-equipment plants, have huge backlogs of orders. Only a shortage of skilled labor can prevent these industries from breaking all previous records.

The next few months may well see the railroads pull themselves out of the doldrums for the first time in 10 years. Rail traffic is almost sure to reach new highs since the "big depression" set in. Railroad earnings will be the best since 1930 and there will be openings for thousands of railroad workers. The railroad revival may be short lived, however. Electric power plants, textile mills, lumber camps, copper, lead, and iron mines, truck factories, should all get "their cut" of expanding activity.

Home builders should handle a fourth again as many "jobs" as in the late months of 1939. With factories frantically pushing expansion plans, many industrial contractors should see their business doubled. Building costs are expected to move upward, too, but less than 5 percent. Real-estate values and activity will improve noticeably, especially around shipyards and in other areas where the defense program is concentrated. Rents for factories, offices, and single houses may be a little firmer.

Naturally an industrial revival, such as is now in prospect, means more jobs and bigger pay rolls. I would not be surprised to see a million jobless people go back to work before snow flies. Wage rates will not be much higher—perhaps only 2 percent on the average. The increase, furthermore, will be due to the boosting of rates in selected jobs rather than a general mark-up in wages. I do not foresee any serious gain in strikes. The public will not tolerate interference from any source in the defense job.

While things will look brighter for city workers, I do not believe that rural areas will fare so well. Only a moderate gain in prices of certain farm products is in prospect, despite the fourth smallest acreage since 1915. There is a big demand for foodstuffs in Europe, but we can do nothing about it as long as Britain's blockade remains unbroken. Dairy products, eggs, canned goods, cattle, and hogs are among the farm products that ought to sell higher this fall. On the whole, prices may average around 3 percent above a year ago with total cash farm income (including Government checks) registering a little bigger increase.

With the demand for goods sharply increased, with a major war on abroad, with the prospect for higher taxes, many people are worried over a runaway rise in living costs. I think such fears are unfounded for the present even though the basic trend of living costs is upward. Household bills are expected to move ahead only moderately—not much more than 3 percent over the current level. The biggest mark-up will come in food. If taxes are figured into the living costs, the average will be somewhat higher because taxes are scheduled to hit the highest point in 25 years some time in the near future.

Heavier pay rolls, higher farm income, bigger dividends, plus fixed living costs, should mean brisker retail sales. But trade in the final half of 1939 was good, so that the gain over last year's level may average less than 5 percent for all lines—including groceries, novelties, furniture, automobiles, dry goods. Price tags will continue their modest mark-ups of early 1940, but need be only 3 percent above the corresponding months of 1939. Advertising volume should increase at least 5 percent over the like period of last year.

Not only should wage workers, businessmen, and farmers be better off, but investors should see increased income. In fact, the next few months will see the largest dividend payments since 1937, providing Congress is reasonable about taxes. Right now stocks are the cheapest in years, based on earnings. World-wide uncertainties, plus excess-profits tax threats, have unnecessarily frightened investors. Hence, prices of certain stocks should move ahead as business activity and profits continue to gain. Selection will be the keynote with steels, rails, munitions, machinery, and retail trade shares most favorably situated.

Interest rates will remain at very low levels; but high-grade long-term bonds should be weaker. Second-grade bonds—particularly rails—are temporarily in a strategic position because (1) the excess-profits tax does not hit them and (2) rail traffic promises to reach a new post-1929 peak this fall. Roads serving the industrial area are the best bet. The Treasury has a job on its hands to underwrite the mammoth defense program without putting the Government bond market "on the spot."

Foreign trade should hold at current levels, well above a year ago. Loss of our continental European markets should be offset by increased trade with South America and perhaps with the Far East. Great Britain will continue to be a big customer as long as the war lasts. No one knows what the outcome of the war in Europe will be. My belief is that it will either end very soon or will drag on for a long time. Whichever happens, I will not change my forecast on business for the next 6 months. This same statement applies regardless of who is elected President in November.

All in all, the remainder of 1940 promises to be the most active final half year in history. Our standard of living, however, will not increase because the defense program will not create more goods for us to divide. Only as more useful goods are produced are there more goods to divide—and only as there are more goods to divide does the standard of living increase. An entirely new tax program must be enacted. On this tax program largely rests the answer to the question, "Will the unproductive defense program give us some indirect benefit by eliminating certain unemployment and by cutting down relief, thus cushioning the fall in the standard of living?"

However, the next few months will seem to be good times, the closest we have come to prosperity since 1929. They will be crucial months—months in which the handling of our domestic political problems, of our foreign problems, of our South American relations, of our defense program will dictate the future destiny of the United States. If we rise to the challenge—if we show intelligence, courage, self-sacrifice, and industry—we need fear no axis, no country, no man. Otherwise much of the coming prosperity will rest on unsound foundations. Good times, built on borrowed money or unproductive labor, always come back to roost.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 5, 1940

RESOLUTION OF UNITED STATES JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce is an organization of young business and professional men between the ages of 21 and 35 from approximately 1,000 local organizations located in all 48 States, the District of Columbia, Alaska, and Hawaii. At their twenty-first annual convention, June 19 to 22, 1940, in Washington, D. C., the 1,600 delegates present adopted a resolution as to their stand on national defense which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved by the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce in convention assembled on this the 21st day of June 1940, That our position with reference to the present significant problems of national defense be stated as follows:

1. We believe in the preservation of the democratic form of government which assures to our citizens the liberties and freedom guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. We believe that the latent dynamics of a democracy, once aroused, are more powerful than the driven dynamics of dictatorships. To obtain that end, we realize that the young men of America have a special responsibility. Hence, we pledge our efforts to allay hysteria and not to forget the need for the solution of important domestic problems which continue to be vital to our democratic form of life and to assist in welding together our people through mutual confidence and trust, recognizing that to achieve this end we must reduce unemployment, preserve industrial peace and the rights of labor, assure the fair treatment that encourages capital investment, assure fair treatment for agriculture, and discourage unfair advantage wherever shown.

2. We consider that the most important problem of the day is the immediate establishment of an adequate national defense.

3. We believe that the following are necessary elements of an adequate national defense:

A. A clear definition of the necessary geographical area of defense. As a minimum, such an area must include the United States and its possessions in the Western Hemisphere.

B. Immediate organization of all resources, including industry and manpower, which includes:

1. Compulsory military training.

2. Training of individuals in skills and techniques necessary to the rapid and efficient production of materials and equipment required for defense.

3. Administrative coordination of all agencies involved directly or indirectly in the defense program; appointment by the President of one person charged with this administrative responsibility; and elimination of delays and unnecessary procedural technicalities.

4. Elimination of excessive profits to industry, agriculture and labor by reason of production incident to the defense program.

5. Development of our own resources with a view to national self-sufficiency through an immediate program of extensive research as to latent resources, chemical substance, mechanical devices and synthetic products.

C. Recognition and willingness to bear the increased costs of such a defense program. Insofar as possible these costs must be paid currently out of tax revenues. As young men, we will assume our share of this burden.

D. Loyalty to the United States of America. We declare our belief in the loyalty of the great majority of our citizens. However, adequate steps must immediately be taken to eliminate all acts of disloyalty to our democratic form of government. This involves, among other steps, strict enforcement of the immigration laws and mandatory registration of all aliens.

E. Elimination of the use of the cloak of diplomatic privilege as a device to conceal unfriendly propaganda and subversive activity.

F. Public knowledge of all pertinent facts relative to problems of national defense and our relationship to foreign conflicts. We insist that our governmental leaders are under an obligation to keep us promptly and fully informed on these matters. We recognize the reciprocal obligation on the part of every citizen to keep himself fully informed.

G. Also, as an element of defense the step may be justified of making available for purchase supplies and equipment to those nations important to our plan of national defense, provided that the requirements of our own defenses shall in no event be prejudiced by such sale.

IV. We oppose sending an armed force outside the Western Hemisphere.

V. No armed force shall be sent beyond our geographical area of defense.

Having faith in our future and confidence in the willingness of our young men to make any sacrifices necessary, the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce tenders to the Nation the services of its members and organizations—local, State, and National—in the establishment of adequate national defense and the maintenance of our democratic form of government.

Racketeering in Labor Unions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLE BY WESTBROOK PEGLER AND JOINT RESOLUTION BY HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a most interesting article by the keen pen of that courageous columnist, Mr. Westbrook Pegler, whose articles are published daily in the Washington Daily Post, of Washington, D. C., as well as many other daily newspapers of the United States.

Mr. Pegler's articles are daily entitled "Fair Enough," and the particular article to which I refer deals with certain racketeers and criminals connected with some union organizations, mentioning particularly one George E. Browne, of Chicago, who, according to Mr. Pegler, "is an associate of criminals of the most dangerous and vicious type," and "Bioff, a common Chicago 'gorilla,' who served in the power ranks of the old Capone-Nitti hooch and prostitution enterprises, who is the real boss with power of death over Browne, and so forth."

In addition thereto I ask that a copy of my proposed legislation (S. J. Res. 275), introduced in the Senate by me on June 10, 1940, which among other things provides that labor organizations or unions may not employ as an agent, representative, or officer an American who has lost his rights to United States citizenship by reason of conviction of a felony be included.

There being no objection, the article and joint resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

NEW YORK.—The International Union of Stagehands and Moving Picture Employees, which is a vicious racket preying on rank-and-file American workers, begins its convention in Louisville on Monday.

This union is controlled by elements of the new Capone mob or syndicate of Chicago criminals. It is a disgrace to the labor movement and a reproach to the American system of government which, by indirect but irresistible Government pressure, compels decent citizens to submit to its brutal and predatory rule.

The president of this racket is George E. Browne, of Chicago, whose voting power, derived from the large number of members, gives him important influence in the American Federation of Labor and a place on the executive council of that organization.

Browne gets $20,000 a year and allowances. He is an associate of criminals of the most dangerous and vicious type, and not only associates with such vermin but appoints them to positions of great power.

IN ONE CITY UNION FEE REACHED $3,000

Helpless under this power, the rank and file are compelled to pay high dues, amounting in some crafts to a 10-percent income tax on their gross earnings, heavy assessments, and fines. In one city the initiation fee reached the incredible and prohibitive amount of $3,000.

Officers of subunions or locals have established private rackets by which they have compelled owners of movie theaters to buy equipment and services from companies in which they were financially interested.

Officers of subunions also have established a licensing system whereby ostensibly free American workmen have been compelled to pay heavily for work permits, but have still been excluded from union membership, which would give them a theoretical and illusory right to vote.

Men in this subhuman, slave category have been compelled to work for nothing when their families needed wages and turn over their pay to the racketeers in command.

Decent American citizens with ever moral right to hold themselves above the most casual contact with a man of Browne's associations have been harried from job to job and from town to town and compelled to live furtively and work under false names.

First vice president under Browne is John P. Nick, a racketeer whose oppression and extortion provoked a rank-and-file rebellion in a St. Louis local and gave rise to the celebrated Post-Dispatch contempt case. Like Browne, he runs with thugs.

BIOFF ACTUALLY HAS CONTROL

Browne announced last Thursday that no action was contemplated by the union against Willie Bioff, his personal appointee to the post of international representative, a nonelective office of tremendous power, who is now in jail in Chicago belatedly serving an old sentence for sharing the earnings of a prostitute.

The actual reason why Browne contemplates no action against Bioff is that Bioff, a common Chicago gorilla, who served in the lower ranks of the old Capone-Nitti hooch and prostitution enterprises, is the real boss of the union, with power of death over Browne. If Browne were to attempt to throw out Bioff or Nick Circella, a stick-up man who is another of his appointees, he probably would be killed.

As to the question of how ably Bioff serves the union, the fact is that Bioff accepted $100,000 from Joseph Schenck, who represented the Hollywood employers in labor negotiations.

Schenck admits that he conveyed the money to Bioff, using an intermediary for purposes of concealment, but says the transaction was a forced loan and insists that Bioff returned the $100,000. The Government has indicted Bioff for failure to declare the $100,000 as income and pay the tax on it.

Schenck also admits that he "put Bioff in the market," and another incident which indicates how faithfully Browne's personal representative served the union was a de luxe cruise to South America on the French liner Normandie by Bioff and his wife, on tickets which cost $3,700 and were paid for by an employer with whom Bioff conducted union negotiations. Schenck takes the position that Bioff used his union power to extort his favors.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 275) to provide for the national defense by prohibiting labor organizations from employing certain persons as officers or agents

Whereas it is common knowledge that "fifth column" activities in various European countries contributed largely to their defeat; and

Whereas such activities consisted in part of sabotage in key industries and propaganda disseminated among the workers of such industries; and

Whereas such activities are now being carried on in this country and will gather more momentum in the future, thus undermining our national defense; and

Whereas because of their key positions in our industrial mobilization plans, officers and agents of labor organizations should all be American citizens whose allegiance to their country is unquestioned and who can be depended upon to cooperate with the Government in stamping out such treacherous activities: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any labor union or other labor organization which represents, or purports to represent, in any manner the interests of any persons employed by any business enterprise which is engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or in the production of goods for such commerce or for national-defense purposes, to have as an officer or agent any person who is not a citizen of the United States, who is a Communist, Fascist, or member of any Nazi bund organization, who has been at any time within the past 2 years a member of or affiliated with any Communist, Fascist, or Nazi bund organization, who is ineligible to hold public office, or who has lost his rights to United States citizenship by reason of conviction of a felony.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of each such labor union or other labor organization to use due diligence to determine whether any of its officers or agents is a person who is prohibited from being such an officer or agent under the provisions of section 1 of this joint resolution.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this joint resolution, the term "labor union or other labor organization" shall include any group which is a part of or affiliated with any labor union or other labor organization which is national in scope or whose jurisdiction extends to more than one State.

SEC. 4. Any labor union or other labor organization willfully violating any of the provisions of this joint resolution shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000; and each such violation shall be deemed to be a separate offense.

The New Order in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 5, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM NEW YORK DAILY NEWS AND WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting editorial originally appearing in the New York Daily News, as reprinted in this morning's Washington Times-Herald, entitled "The New Order in Asia."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEW ORDER IN ASIA

The new Japanese Cabinet, headed by Premier Fumimaro Konoye, plans to make Japan even more of a totalitarian state than it has been. More significant than that for the rest of the world, the Konoye government is mapping out some Japanese expansion which it hopes will cost Japan less and profit it more than the war in China has done up to now.

French Indochina is on the list of properties which Prince Konoye hopes to pick up for Japan. So are the Dutch East Indies. So, apparently, is British-owned Hong Kong; and it would surprise few people if the American-owned Philippine Islands should turn out to be on that same list.

There are rich pickings in the Orient for a strong, aggressive nation like Japan when the western world has a major war going on. Prince Konoye doesn't intend that the grass shall grow under Japan's feet while the white folks bleed themselves still whiter. The whole structure which he plans is to go by the resounding name of "The New Order for Greater East Asia."

A CHANGE OF BOSSES

What puzzles us is why so many Americans are so worried by the prospect of these changes.

We can't see any reason for moral indignation over Japan's expected seizure of the lands above named. The Dutch never exercised democracy in the Dutch East Indies. They exploited those rich islands and their easy-going natives methodically and thoroughly.

Certainly the French didn't bring the blessings of democracy to Indochina. They farmed and mined it just as the Dutch did the East Indies. Britishers in Hong Kong have never been famed for a chummy, democratic attitude toward the Chinese. When you come right down to it, our efforts to bring democracy to the Philippines have been pretty much blocked by the Filipinos' own dislike of us and all our ways.

If these territories should be taken over by the Japanese, it would only mean a change of bosses for their inhabitants, most of whom probably wouldn't care, and probably would be neither better nor worse off after the seizure.

POLITICS AND RUBBER

It is also argued that if Japan takes the Dutch East Indies we'll be out of luck for the 600,000 long tons of rubber which we consume annually. Japan is expected to cut us off from this vital supply, and also from the tin and quinine which we import from the East Indies.

That is nonsense. We are sometimes foolish enough to cut off good customers because we don't like their politics, but Japan isn't. If we play ball with Japan, Japan will play ball with us, commercially, at least. Japan always has. For decades, Japan has been a better customer of ours than China, has bought more from us and has sold us more.

If the East Indies rubber is cut off from us it will be because our Government refuses to recognize changes on the map; insists on hanging to the status quo though the heavens fall, or though Americans have to go to great expense to build up a synthetic-rubber industry.

We'd better get realistic about such things as Japan's rise to overlordship of the East.

If we don't, we'll commit ourselves to a policy of combating changes on the map wherever they occur—combating them by protest notes, trade embargoes, or actual warfare. That will mean that one of the world's greatest and richest nations will be working unceasingly to cripple the flow of trade around the world and dam back needed goods from the areas that need them.

Such a policy may be as righteous as the late Woodrow Wilson. But its practical effect will be to keep prices higher than they should be and world living standards lower than they need be.

Let's build up our Army to 1,000,000 mechanic-sergeants, 50,000 planes, and 100,000 pilots; let the Philippines go if Japan makes a pass at them; and mind our own business—meaning our own dollars-and-cents business as well as our own political business.

Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 5, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SUMMER SESSION COLLEGIAN

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Summer Session Collegian of July 26, 1940, entitled "A Change of Policy."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the State College (Pa.) Summer Session Collegian of July 26, 1940]

A CHANGE OF POLICY

As traditional as the tower of Old Main, and almost as hallowed by the years, has been the antipathy of the Collegian toward compulsory military training at Penn State. Ever since this college was a two-by-four agricultural settlement, denouncing the R. O. T. C. has been a required course for every Collegian editor.

When all else failed—when the combined brain power of the editorial staff failed to produce a single literary spark—the flood of student apathy for the hated R. O. T. C. could always be tapped to fill the editorial column. "Down With Rotisse" has been a campus byword for years.

Typical idiotic college journalism? But the Collegian was only serving in its just capacity as a mirror of student opinion. Everybody hated military training. It was a bore, a useless, unnecessary evil. "Do away with it! Why do we need military training? It's propaganda for war!"

The Collegian was not the only college newspaper to denounce military training. Nor was Penn State the only campus on which it was hated. Many land-grant colleges successfully abolished it.

And all of this college antimilitary feeling was but the reflection of a vast national movement. Books, movies, newspapers everywhere recited the horrors of war. The mighty power of propaganda was used to drive deep into the fiber of America a hatred, a loathing for war and everything warlike. Never again would we waste our billions and our boys' lives! Isolationism became our paramount doctrine of foreign policy.

And the "voices in the wilderness" who urged preparedness were shouted down, were branded as warmongers, were crucified.

NOW AMERICA REAPS ITS REWARD

The most vital crisis of our history. Hitler, his appetite whetted on the blood of France, sharpening the knife of nazi-ism for Britain. Democracy at the crossroads. The future black for the hopes of free people.

And America—the greatest nation in the world—so handcuffed by her own nearsightedness that she has not so much as a single military unit capable of opposing the mighty German machine. America so unprepared that her entire Army could not hold the State of Pennsylvania for a week against a "blitzkrieg" assault.

These are the fruits of isolationism. This is the result of the idealistic spirit which prompted countless Collegian editors to write countless editorials against R. O. T. C.

Fortunately, the Atlantic Ocean and England may give the United States time to make amends. But much of the damage has already been done, with America powerless to interfere, the strong statements of her Chief Executive carrying no more weight than the impregnability of the Maginot line.

And, awakened like Congress from its long dream of "splendid isolation," the Collegian is now ready to admit its guilt. The Summer Collegian hereby repudiates once and for all its antimilitary policy and pledges itself to the support of compulsory military training for America's youth.

We hope that we—and America—have not "seen the light" too late.

Give the Volunteer System a Fair Chance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HAMILTON FISH, OF NEW YORK, OVER THE AMERICAN RADIO FORUM PROGRAM

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the American Radio Forum broadcast over the Mutual Broadcasting Co. network, Sunday evening, August 4, 1940:

As one who has voted for most of the administration's measures for national defense in the House, I insisted, before accepting the invitation to speak on this program, on being permitted a liberal construction of the subject under discussion.

The question of national defense is the biggest issue before Congress, and will continue to be the most important issue until we adjourn.

I believe in making America invincible on sea and air, and recruiting our Army and National Guard up to 800,000 as prescribed by Congress or even to 1,000,000 men.

I submit that the volunteer system, according to the Adjutant General, has not failed to provide all the recruits asked for by the Army. This is a matter of record, in spite of the inspired propaganda and extraordinary myth that has been let loose on the public in the eastern newspapers.

The time has come for clear and intelligent thinking and deliberate action, based on facts and not on propaganda. The Congress must proceed carefully before it attempts to regiment American youth and conscript them in time of peace.

We must not, under a barrage of war hysteria, import the European war system and foreign forms of militarism and autocracy into America, or bring over a counterpart of Hitler's dictatorship to the United States.

Our answer to the dictator nations is to make democracy work in America, and not subvert it with a military dictatorship or by the European conscription or war system.

I am convinced that if Congress will reduce the term of enlistment for the Army and National Guard from 3 years to 1 year and increase the pay from $21 to $30 a month we could get 400,000 volunteers by the first of October, or within 30 days of the time the change is made by law. In case of failure to obtain all the volunteers we want, I would vote for a temporary modified conscription bill providing for 400,000 to be drafted by October 1 and reducing the age limit from 64 to 25, because we need youth, not old men, to serve and fight in defense of our country.

If we need to increase the size of our Army next spring, then let the new Congress that convenes in January consider the situation at that time and act in accordance with our needs for national defense.

This proposal would not jeopardize our preparedness program, as we could not and had not intended to train more than 400,000 men by next spring.

We must try out our American volunteer system before resorting to any form of military conscription in time of peace, and before regimenting American youth into a huge military machine after the pattern of Hitler and other foreign dictators.

Conscription in peace is not the American way, but the road to militarism, dictatorship, and war.

The Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill, if voted upon next Monday, would not have the support of 10 percent of the Republicans in the House and probably not more than half of the Democrats.

I do not impugn the motives or sincerity of the New York Times or other proponents and originators of the draft bill. I do know, however, that it did not originate from the National Grange, American Farm Bureau, American Federation of Labor, nor does it represent the viewpoint of the farmers or the wage earners in America.

Whom do we fear? Do we fear Hitler, who seems afraid to attack England over 20 miles of sea, when he would have 3,000 miles to cross over here? That is preposterous, when we have the greatest Navy in the world, six or seven times larger than the German Navy, or that we should fear Hitler and Mussolini combined to make it necessary to rush in and conscript two or three million American youths.

We have an air force of 5,000 planes, and are expanding it at the potential rate of 800 airplanes a month. Yet no airplane has ever been invented, as Col. Charles Lindbergh rightly said, that could fly over here, bomb our cities, and get back to its European base.

Let us stop this fear hysteria and expose the war propaganda of the interventionists who are trying to force us into the European war against the will of 95 percent of the American people.

Let the American people ask the administration to take them into their confidence. What war do we face? How imminent is it? Is it the truth that "every day counts," as some administration leaders say behind closed doors?

With whom are we going to fight?
Where are we going to fight?
When are we going to fight?
Why are we going to fight?

I have yet to hear any Member of the Senate or the House of Representatives answer any one of these questions.

Why are all the cards kept under the table, concealed from the duly elected Representatives of the people, not to mention the people themselves?

It is my deliberate and sincere judgment that conscription in time of peace is un-American, undemocratic, and would create a huge military machine or Frankenstein that would devour our free institutions and destroy our constitutional and republican form of government.

All history and particularly contemporary history proves that placing the power of life and livelihood in the hands of any one man is the road to dictatorship and totalitarianism. I am bitterly opposed to both, and shall resist conscription until every effort has been made to exhaust the advantages of the American volunteer system under which our rights and liberties as a free people have been preserved.

Our Foreign Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WADE H. KITCHENS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, in spite of most of the world being in the flames of war, our country is still trading and doing business. I have some statistics and will incorporate them along in my remarks.

Summary of foreign trade of the United States during June and the first 6 months of 1940

	June 1940	June 1939	January–June
			1940	1939
Exports including re-exports	$350,000,000	$236,000,000	$2,068,000,000	$1,416,000,000
General imports	211,000,000	179,000,000	1,294,000,000	1,094,000,000
Export balance	139,000,000	57,000,000	774,000,000	322,000,000

During June 1940 the normal seasonal recession in trade did not occur, and the exports, including reexports, were 8 percent above those for the 2 preceding months. Due principally to the continued heavy exportation of war material, exports during the first 6 months of 1940 were nearly 40 percent above those for the same period of 1939, whereas imports for the first 6 months of this year were about 14 percent greater than those for the comparable period of 1939.

The volume of both exports and imports increased less than the value because of the higher prices obtaining this year.

The export balance for the first half of 1940 was the highest for any similar period since 1921.

Exports and imports during the war period, September 1939 through June 1940

	1939–40	1938–39
Exports including reexports	$3,347,000,000	$2,461,000,000
General imports	2,192,000,000	1,787,000,000

For the 10-month war period, September 1939 through June 1940, exports were 36 percent greater than during the comparable months of 1938, while imports were about 23 percent greater. In addition to the heavy demand for war materials from the belligerent countries, countries of the Western Hemisphere increased their demand for iron and steel.

Exports of domestic merchandise

	January–June
	1940	1939
Total	$2,022,000,000	$1,398,000,000
Agricultural	353,000,000	268,000,000
Nonagricultural	1,669,000,000	1,130,000,000

The heavy shipments of cotton, amounting to 8.5 percent of all exports, were almost entirely responsible for the increased value of agricultural exports during the first half of 1940, over the same period 1939. However, exports of corn, soybeans, fresh, dried and canned vegetables, and edible-vegetable oils and fats were greater this year than last.

Important commodities adversely affected by the war in the value of their exports during the first 6 months of 1940, compared with the corresponding months of 1939 were automobiles, gasoline, lumber, foodstuffs, and tobacco.

The import value of six leading strategic defense materials—crude rubber, tin, ferromanganese, nickel, silk, and wool—increased from $169,000,000 during the first half of 1939, to $308,000,000 during the first half of 1940, an increase of 82 percent.

In addition to increases in the national-defense materials imported during the first half of this year over the same period of last year, much higher values were shown for the 1940 imports of newsprint and paper base stocks, petroleum and its products, sawed boards, gas oil, coal-tar products, and burlaps.

Government Stand-by Plants—Best Answer to Problem of Defense Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, if we really mean what we say about not letting anything interfere with the progress of the national-defense effort, there are certain considerations regarding procurement of weapons and equipment which cannot possibly be overlooked. Machinery has become all important and I think almost anyone will agree, at least theoretically, that we should be in a position to obtain it promptly in times of necessity and at the least possible cost to the people of America. It is obvious that private enterprise cannot afford to maintain idle plant capacity in continual readiness for an emergency that may never arise. Therefore, if such additional capacity, created during an emergency, is in the hands of private enterprise, it either must be sacrificed or otherwise disposed of or else arms and implements of war must continue to be produced on a large scale and either sold at home at great expense or sold to foreign nations, there to become, in many cases, a threat to this country.

It seems to me, therefore, clear that the only sensible thing to do is for the Government to maintain such stand-by productive capacity as may be necessary much as it maintains its battleships and forts. Peacetime needs of the Army and Navy might be partly cared for in such plants by means of a skeleton staff. Continual experimentation could be carried on. Never again would we find ourselves in the situation we are now confronting where the Nation is compelled to meet the terms of private manufacturers, whatever they may be, and where a great deal of time is required to get actual manufacturing of defense materials under way.

It is unreasonable, furthermore, to expect private industry to supply the needs of the Nation in times of stress, for it is obviously necessary at such times that the most modern and up-to-date equipment be obtained, and in the very nature of the case private industry cannot very well be prepared to do this job since it is engaged in a task of continuous production of peacetime goods and cannot change its tools, dyes, and machinery overnight. If it tries to do this, serious economic dislocation is certain to result once the period of emergency has passed. These factors combined with the inevitable increase in unemployment and other deflationary influences which may be expected at the conclusion of any period of stress are certain to lead to a situation which I need not, I am sure, elaborate.

Even if the governmental defense program would fully amortize the cost of excess plant capacity in the hands of private manufacturers, the very existence of these empty plants in the hands of private industry is bound to increase the depth of depression, and this is entirely aside from a further question of why private industry rather than the people of the United States should have title to such plants when the Government has in fact paid for them. These considerations should lead us to careful thought on what ought to be done in the present situation.

Certain alternatives suggest themselves. The first is that plants to make possible additional necessary production for defense be constructed for a Government agency by a private manufacturer and be operated by that manufacturer under a management contract. Title to the plant would remain in the Government agency and units produced would be sold by the agency to the Government either at cost or at cost plus an amount which would amortize the investment over a reasonable period. The private manufacturer would, of course, be paid a reasonable compensation for management and supervision and this might either be a fixed sum, or, as an incentive to greater production, be increased on the basis of the number of defense units produced.

A second plan which I would suggest would be this: That a plant might be constructed for a Government agency by a private manufacturer and leased to him by the agency at a rental based upon a percentage of proceeds of each defense unit produced and sold. Such rental should include provision for amortization of the investment. The manufacturer should have the right to termination of the lease without any further liability to him whenever he is no longer receiving Government contracts. The Government agency on the other hand would have the right to terminate the lease if the manufacturer failed to fill orders or refuse to accept them on reasonable terms.

Third alternative is the construction and operation of such emergency plants by Government agency itself. The problem in this case would, of course, be the one in obtaining the right sort of personnel and I would be perfectly willing to pay well for such personnel under circumstances of this sort. Under circumstances of this kind, the cost of an armament program would be protected against all charges except those actually necessary. The possibility of profiteering would be eliminated.

It is widely reported that private manufacturers have declared that they are not especially anxious to do the things they will have to do in order to transform their plants or add to them with the purpose of the defense program. This is after all not the kind of production that can be fitted into the plans of an efficient private enterprise without serious disruption.

Under the plans I have suggested, everybody in the picture, the Government, the taxpayers, and the manufacturers would all know exactly where they stood. Production for defense needs could be started at any time and carried forward promptly and plants could be located at the most strategic points. I know that there is but small chance that what I have to say about these matters will be listened to today but I have been profoundly disheartened at some of the reports that have come to me about the excessive terms of some of the defense contracts. Some day the history of these times will be written and those who read that history will wonder why some such reasonable plan for defense production as I have outlined above, was not adopted.

HON. LISTER HILL

ARTICLE BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very strong article by Miss Freda Kirchwey, published in The Nation of August 3 last, under the caption "There Is No Alternative." There is no alternative for the selective-service bill.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Nation of August 3, 1940]

THERE IS NO ALTERNATIVE

(By Freda Kirchwey)

Almost every sentence in Maxwell Stewart's attack on conscription in this issue of The Nation is, by itself, convincing. The trouble with his argument lies in its premises. He analyzes the proposal for universal military service today in terms of the draft army of 1917, and in those terms he opposes it—cogently. If our Army is to be only the A. E. F. over again, its value is certainly to be questioned. But the very circumstances in which it is being created insure important differences.

The conscript Army of 1917 was improvised after war had been declared. With surprising efficiency considering the pressure of events, but hastily none the less, 2,000,000 men were selected, trained, and put under arms. The raising of this Army was a temporary break in a normal national life in which military affairs were happily remote from the ordinary citizen. After the war armament expenditures were sharply reduced, the Army was demobilized, and the United States washed its hands of the affairs of Europe.

Contrast the situation today: France disastrously defeated in the field and Hitler lord over continental Europe; Britain, with no unconquered Allies except its colonies and the dominions, facing imminent assault. No one knows whether Britain will be able to resist or will be overwhelmed with the loss of empire and fleet. But, at best, we cannot realistically hope for an early defeat of Hitler. Churchill's warning after Dunkerque that a successful withdrawal must not be confused with a victory applies to England's present situation. A successful resistance will also not be a victory. The political and military dominance of Nazi Germany, together with the spreading power of Japan in Asia—these are the controlling characteristics of the world of 1940. The creation of a strong army is not a temporary emergency measure; it is part of a long-range program necessitated by a world situation which is likely to grow worse.

A period of peace preceded the war of 1914. It was a period pricked with warnings for those who chose to see them; but few did. The world awoke to war with a start. The present war is different. It began—where? In the Rhineland or in Ethiopia? Or before that in the bare hills of Manchuria? It is not an event that can be pinned down with a date, but this much is sure: Hitler did not defeat France in 40 days of invasion; he defeated France in the years that went before—years of deliberate, implacable preparation. Britain and France were at peace during those years, but Germany was at war. Britain and France approached the final showdown in much the same mood that characterized the years leading up to 1914—the same old diplomatic maneuvers, the conventional pre-World War military preparations. They believed that they were at peace until they found themselves fighting, but all the time they were in process of being conquered.

It is this error that the United States should avoid. As long as Nazi despotism rules Europe and threatens the world, so long must the word and hope of peace be banished from our minds. Even today the United States is no longer at peace. It is living in a state of war preparation which will last until fascism has been defeated. Hitler's successes and further ambitions have thrust upon us an unwelcome but inescapable job of total preparation. Out of nothing—speaking relatively—we must create a war machine, not as an emergency improvisation but as an integral part of our national life in the years to come.

Maxwell Stewart opposes conscription for two reasons. First, he contends, we need no large army; a two-ocean navy, an expanded air force, together with antiaircraft defenses, and a well-equipped army of about 300,000 men are all that is required. For such an army conscription is unnecessary. Second, American experience with conscription in 1917 was not the sort to recommend the system today.

Even in his own terms Mr. Stewart is not wholly consistent. At the start of his essay he says, "Conscription in wartime is regrettable but necessary." But why? If a small, well-equipped army were sufficient, conscription would never be necessary. On the other hand, if, as Mr. Stewart admits, a conscript army is required in case of war, it should most certainly be created before the actual fighting begins. That is the real lesson of 1917. For such an army must not be improvised. Its construction and equipping are a long job, especially today, when, as Mr. Stewart points out, the intricate machines of modern warfare demand a high proportion of technically trained soldiers.

It is quite true that the final size and disposition of the Army cannot be determined exactly until we know the issue of the struggle over England. As long as the British Fleet is intact, we have a two-ocean navy. If it is lost to Hitler, we have far less than a one-ocean navy. If it is lost, we must rush our preparations in order to be able to occupy by land and air forces any threatened area near our coasts or within striking distance of the Panama Canal. A two-ocean navy takes longer to build than even a modern army; during the next few years, years in which Hitler will be making his bid for world dominion, our newly authorized navy will still be under construction. Today we must act on the assumption that Britain may be defeated and that we may be faced with an early threat to the security of the hemisphere. It will be easier later on to limit our program, if fate permits, than to try, in the face of threat, to reach the level of totalitarian preparation in one desperate leap.

Mr. Stewart's second main argument against compulsory military service rests on two sets of facts—his experiences in the American Army during the World War, and the reactionary influence of the conscript armies of Europe. With many of his points I agree. At a time when a reasonable chance existed of maintaining our independence and our democratic way of life without a big army, his insistence on the social dangers of militarism and on the deadening effect of army discipline would have bespoken a radical and militant attitude. Today that chance is gone. We have no choice between civilian virtues and military vices, between good and evil, between an army and no army. The choice lies between an army based on universal service and a greatly expanded professional army. That is the issue under debate in Washington this week. Admittedly a conscript army holds many potential dangers of reaction; admittedly, even in democratic nations, the armies are more reactionary than the general political level of the countries; at the same time the dangers of reactionary control in a volunteer professional army are even greater.

By and large, in every nation, the progressive groups in the community have shunned the army. This is due partly to a sensible objection to military life and military ideals, partly to the lack of professional inducements to take up an army career. The result is that a volunteer army is largely populated with able-bodied ne'er-do-wells and misfits, officered by reactionaries and bureaucrats. An army based on universal service will not be democratic per se, but it offers all the elements out of which a democratic institution can be built. To reject universal service out of fear of its potentially reactionary results would be to deliver the army to the reactionaries without a struggle. The very dangers to which Mr. Stewart points lead me to the opposite conclusion. An army is at best a favorable breeding ground for reaction. We must fight for its democratization; and success in that fight is only possible if we have an army in which all elements of the population are represented.

American liberals should recognize before it is too late what the British working class and its leaders realized only after the war had started—that the left must take a positive position on the question of national defense. It must make the struggle against Hitler an honest fight for the faith it lives by. And it can do this in only one way—by working not against the army but for army. It must help to create it and man it and then to control it—by democratic methods and for democratic ends.

Our Banks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE BEAVER (PA.) DAILY TIMES

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Daily Times, of Beaver, Pa.:

[From the Beaver (Pa.) Daily Times of August 3, 1940]

OUR BANKS

Government credit—Government banking—whatever you wish to call it—means far more than the socialization of an industry. The average man may not stop to think that if the Government should suddenly take over the banks in his community, it would not be just stepping into the local bankers shoes to supervise a single enterprise. Banking does not halt at the marble facade fronting Main street. Any bank statement will revel the deep economic roots of banking. Listed among assets you will find heavy investments in practically every form of enterprise in every corner of the land, including mortgages on homes, farms, peanut stands, ad infinitum. You will also find thousands or even millions in loans, promissory notes, and other obligations of private citizens.

Banking is every man's business. Every man's business would become Government business if the Government controlled banking, directly or indirectly, through the influence of political power and favor.

Private management, under proper, safe, and reasonable public regulation, means the ultimate in precautionary measures to insure the safety and integrity of banking. Nothing would so strike at the foundation of free enterprise as political domination and control of banking and credit. Such a step would create a financial monopoly that for sheer size and power would dwarf anything the world has ever seen before. It might easily lead to confiscation by Government force of all material resources of the people.

The American system of private banking is a highly competitive business. Banks are anxious to make loans and investments. That is their source of income and their chief reason for existence. Fifteen thousand banks in this country are constantly striving to encourage community growth and prosperity. Every banker knows that he will fail or succeed with the community in which he lives and to which his bank affords a banking service. These incentives to service and progress are lacking in any business dominated and controlled by remote political power.

We do not—we cannot—believe that Americans want or will tolerate a politically controlled banking system. Already we have seen enough to indicate clearly what political control of banking would mean to the people and to all forms of free and successful enterprise on which the growth and success of this great Nation squarely and securely rests.

We have seen governmental force beat down interest rates toward the zero mark. Perhaps this was done to avoid immediate national bankruptcy. With a national debt of approximately fifty billions, the national income would scarcely more than meet interest charges alone at 6 percent. While forcing down interest rates to its own temporary advantage, the administration has reduced by two-thirds the only income of numerous millions of investors and savings account owners.

Privately owned and managed banks are necessary to the continued progress and prosperity of our country and every community. We urge Times readers to write or wire Members of Congress—both in the House and the Senate—to oppose all legislation that tends to give politicians in or out of office any measure or degree of political control over our banking system. It is the writer's conviction, after many years' study of and experience in the banking business, that all the banks of the whole country would be in a better position if all belonged to the Federal Reserve System. It has demonstrated its value and usefulness to its entire membership. Its service, influence, and general usefulness would be much enlarged if all banks were members because the System is successfully managed by bankers, not by politicians.

OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

OPEN LETTER FROM EDITOR OF UTICA (OHIO) HERALD

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following open letter addressed to me from the Utica (Ohio) Herald:

[From the Utica (Ohio) Herald]

EDITOR WRITES AN OPEN LETTER TO OUR CONGRESSMAN—OFFICERS TRAINING METHODS ALL WRONG, SAYS "YE ED," WHO KNOWS FROM EXPERIENCE

UTICA, OHIO, July 29, 1940.

Mr. J. HARRY MCGREGOR,
Congressman, Seventeenth Ohio,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HARRY: A recent article in Look magazine by Maj. Leonard Nason, entitled "Why Hitler Laughs at America," had some mighty good points in it and one of them was in regard to the training of civilians to be officers in the United States Army.

The idea of the old-line generals who have charge of this officer training would be laughable if they were not so tragic at this time. Imagine anyone being so dumb that they think the way to teach officers how to command hundreds or even thousands of men, or how to move these men from place to place or to supply them with food, ammunition, or transportation is to teach them to make a bed or wait on table.

These officers who come into the army from civilian life will in large numbers be used on staff jobs where their habits of business efficiency and dispatch can best help the cause and yet they are making them waste their time peeling potatoes or cleaning rifles.

The present Regular Army and National Guard is full of corporals and sergeants who could quite reasonably be promoted to lieutenants and captains and who could do a far better job of teaching privates how to use their weapons, how to make their beds, care for their equipment, etc.

Hitler and his Nazis have won thus far because of their perfect organization together with fine coordination of weapons and manpower. Did they get this organization and coordination by having staff officers make beds and peel potatoes? What is your guess?

Of course, I suppose if you have 4 years to make an officer you could make him learn all the details of soldiering but the American businessman has neither the time nor the patience for such foolishness.

Back in World War days we who were to be given commissions and who were called—pathetically true just often "90-day wonders"—spent weeks on drill and rifles and minor details and only a few hours on military problems of leading men and of meeting various situations and handicaps such as always present themselves in wartime.

It seems that the Army never changes. Just the other day President Roosevelt appointed a $12,000 a year judge to be the Assistant Secretary of War and do you know what this man was doing when news of the appointment reached him? He was in a businessmen's training camp at Plattsburg and he was working in the kitchen.

I submit to you that in all common sense we ought to junk all the generals who know so little as to expect to teach a staff officer how to solve big troop problems by having him sling hash.

Of course it is no disgrace to sling hash, peel potatoes, or work in a kitchen. Quite the contrary for Napoleon said truly "that an army travels on its stomach."

But when the Army and the country, too, is full of men who know how to prepare the best possible menus on the least money, it is just plain silly to have men who are worth $1,000 a month doing that when they might use those thousand-dollar brains on problems for which they are more fitted.

What can you do about it? Well, you can raise so much dash, dash, dash about these antiquated army training methods that when our boys do have to go into battle they will not be butchered by the Nazis because the officers who should have known how to get them supplies, ammunition, weapons, etc., are busy teaching buck privates how to make up an army cot in the style approved by the 1904 regulations, page 3, in the red book.

Yours for a common-sense army made up of Americans who, as Mark Twain is reported to have said "are as good as anybody and probably a damn sight better."

Stay in there, Harry, and keep fighting for the little man, for he needs friends as never before.

Most cordially yours,

R. R. BRINKERHOFF.

RESOLUTIONS COMMENDING JAMES A. FARLEY

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith a resolution unanimously passed by the Democratic County Convention of Hill County, Tex., on August 3, 1940, commending the Honorable James A. Farley.

Hill County, Tex., is one of the counties which I have the honor to represent in Congress, and the sentiments expressed in the resolution reflect my own feelings and admiration for Jim Farley and I believe also that millions of other American citizens have the same affectionate regard and admiration for him.

Whereas the Honorable James A. Farley, of New York, has rendered distinguished and outstanding service to the Democratic Party for many years, it is most fitting that this convention express deep appreciation on behalf of the Democrats of Hill County to this great Democratic leader on the eve of his voluntary retirement as chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Jim Farley will be long remembered as one of the great Americans of this era. Future historians will probably brand him as the greatest and most popular leader within the ranks of the Democratic Party during his generation. He has been the most effective and most beloved national chairman ever to serve the party.

It has been truthfully said by a noble American statesman that absolute faith can always be placed in the pledged word of Jim Farley. This trait is becoming rare in the lives of men who occupy high place in the governments throughout the world. It is with natural pride that the Democrats of Hill County can join the Democrats of the United States in pointing to this top leader as a man who has that true quality of character.

Jim Farley is the very example of clean and honorable living, of integrity, and his name will forever be associated with that of fair and square dealing in American public life; therefore be it

Resolved by the Hill County Democratic Convention assembled in Hillsboro, Tex., on the 3d day of August, 1940, That we do hereby express our complete confidence in retiring National Chairman Farley and send to him our best wishes for the future; be it further

Resolved, That we send to the new national chairman, Hon. Edward J. Flynn, of New York, the friend of Mr. Farley, our pledge of fullest cooperation in the carrying on of the affairs of the Democratic Party.

The above resolution was unanimously passed by the Democratic County Convention assembled in Hillsboro, Tex., on the 3d day of August 1940.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLES FROM THE ROANOKE (VA.) TIMES

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following articles from the Roanoke Times of August 4, 1940:

[From the Roanoke (Va.) Times of August 4, 1940]

WOODRUM "MAN OF WEEK" IN CONGRESSIONAL WORK—CONGRESSMAN STEERS T. V. A. AND DEFENSE MEASURES THROUGH HOUSE

WASHINGTON, August 3.—Virginia's Representative CLIFTON A. WOODRUM was again the "man of the week" in the congressional legislative program.

The Virginian acted as chief pilot in the House for the two principal bills passed during the week, the $25,000,000 appropriation for expanding facilities in the Tennessee Valley Authority for essential national-defense works, and the $5,000,000,000 supplemental national-defense appropriation bill.

As appropriations subcommittee chairman and frequently as acting chairman of the full committee, it has been WOODRUM'S responsibility to act as floor manager for House action on a majority of the supply measures passed.

PRESSES FOR ECONOMY

At the same time he has been recognized as a leader of the House group which has demanded the closest possible trimming of all outlays, and has led the fight to keep all outlays within Budget figures.

While there was little opposition to the bills voted this week, WOODRUM nevertheless seized the opportunity to reiterate his often-voiced views on the subject of Federal expenditures.

"I do not know of any controversy in the bill," he told the House in presenting the $5,000,000,000 defense measure. "That does not mean that we did not go into it carefully. We did, but I say this for the Appropriations Committee as a whole and for each subcommittee dealing with this defense program: The fact that we are in a great emergency calling for mobilization of our resources and of our manpower for defense needs in no way minimizes or lessens the importance of watching and seeing to those fundamental principles of accounting and Budget balancing, about which Congress has been and should be very much concerned.

FOLLOW-THROUGH PROMISES

"It is going to be the purpose of the Appropriations Committee and of each subcommittee to follow every one of these appropriations just as carefully as we can humanly do so and see to the application of the purchase money as we would say in the law, or see to it that these funds are expended in the manner in which Congress means them to be spent, and that the American taxpayer gets a dollar's worth of defense for every dollar we appropriate. We believe that can be done and that it will be done."

WOODRUM agreed that "it is necessary in this emergency to act quickly, to act expeditiously, and the fact that a bill of this size will pass in 1 day's consideration, by the Congress does not mean that we are any less interested in fiscal affairs, or are going to be any less zealous in days to come to see to it that useless expenditures are cut off and that there shall be an orderly accounting in all fiscal affairs."

In presenting the case for the $25,000,000 T. V. A. bill, Woodrum spoke in lavish praise of the men making up the Defense Advisory Commission, who urgently advocated the legislation.

"I doubt if any man in this Chamber," he told the House, "would challenge the fact that Mr. William S. Knudsen, head of the Commission, is probably as well, if not better, qualified than any man in the United States when it comes to the question of mass production, of actually producing expeditiously the necessary implements of national defense.

"AIDS ALSO PRAISED

"Mr. Knudsen surrounded himself with experts of equal prominence, one of the principal of whom is Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., former chairman of the board of United States Steel.

"These men proceeded to surround themselves with men expert in their own particular lines in order to build up this defense program and get it going. I for one wish to record the fact that I believe everything humanly possible is being done to carry out the wishes of Congress and the wishes of the American people that this defense program be expedited and that we not only appropriate money but get something for the money that we appropriate, and get it quickly."

WOODRUM SAYS PEOPLE BEHIND DEFENSE PLANS—CONGRESSMAN CALLS FOR SACRIFICES AT CLIFTON FORGE CELEBRATION

CLIFTON FORGE, August 3.—Representative CLIFTON A. WOODRUM said today "the people of this country are now resolved that the iron heel of the dictator or any combinations of dictators shall not press upon the soil of the Western Hemisphere."

Representative WOODRUM, speaking at a luncheon held as a part of the Lions' Club Founders Week celebration, declared defense is uppermost in the minds of the American people today and the Nation is now bent on the greatest industrial and military mobilization in the history of the world.

He recalled how the United States, in the interest of world peace, scrapped a large portion of its Navy in 1921, and traced the steps now being taken to rearm this country.

QUEEN IS CROWNED

Later in the afternoon, Frank B. Haynes, Lion's club president, crowned Miss Mary Wallace, of Covington, queen of the celebration, at exercises at the municipal playground. There the throng was also entertained by addresses and a band concert. A parade with gaily decorated floats, drum and bugle corps, military units, and fraternal and civic organizations taking part was held prior to the program at the playground.

Representative WOODRUM warned that regardless of the outcome of the European struggle, this country will have to adjust itself to a new world economy.

"We of America must prepare to meet a new economy which will call for sacrifice on the part of every man and woman in this country," he said.

"It is my opinion," he went on, "that the tide is turning in Europe—that the dictators have run against a snag and have found that armed force alone will not win the war.

"Here in America we pray that Great Britain may be given abundant power to save herself. America, we know, cannot be saved by the Democratic Party or the Republican Party, but by men and women who put love of country above everything else."

PROMINENT PERSONS ATTEND

Other prominent persons introduced at the luncheon by the toastmaster, C. H. Lawler, included:

Nominating Hon. John Nance Garner for President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD M. KLEBERG
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

ADDRESS BY WRIGHT MORROW

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by

Wright Morrow nominating JOHN NANCE GARNER for President on the Democratic ticket, the National Democratic Convention, Chicago, July 1940:

Mr. Chairman, fellow Democrats and delegates, ladies and gentlemen, 8 years ago, in this great American city, the Democratic Party assembled to write its platform and nominate standard bearers to carry the message of the party to a people then desperate and despairing of an economic situation unparalleled in our history. Here we met, confronted with the clearest of calls to arise and arouse ourselves to meet the needs and demands of our people. Here we met, and, after consideration of those proposed, we nominated our great leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt for President, and his running mate, the great Texan, JOHN NANCE GARNER, for Vice President. The delegation from the Lone Star State of Texas, which I now have the honor to represent, had the privilege in that convention, when it appeared it would be deadlocked, to place their votes and influence in support of Mr. Roosevelt for President, and, for that reason, we proudly claim no small part of the credit for giving him to this Nation. That we chose wisely and well is proven by the record.

Upon the election of these two men in November of that year, there arose immediately and spontaneously a new hope in the hearts of the people of the United States—a hope that had been almost crushed under the conditions that existed in the previous Republican administration. With their hearts and minds filled with naught save patriotic purpose, the leaders of this great administration set about the rebuilding of the morale of this citizenship and by almost superhuman energy and enterprise, aided by Members of the Congress, brought our people through this crucible of adversity and restored to them the desire again to live, to work, and to hold their heads high as citizens of this Republic. The legislative accomplishments of that period immediately after the inauguration in 1933, looking to the welfare of this Nation and its people is unsurpassed in our history.

Then we came to 1936. We presented to the voters of the Nation the same ticket for the second term. We pointed to their record of achievement and asked approval. With unanimity unprecedented in political annals, the voters returned our great party and its great leadership to the control of our affairs.

In concluding a public address at that time, I made this statement, which I believed then, and I believe now. It is so easy for people to forget that I take the liberty of repeating it here:

"They, the Republicans, crave to get back in power and govern a prosperous and peaceful people. They ask not only approval and applause but a reward for their failure—but the people of the United States—the great mass of people—remember the things that have been done for them. They remember their anxiety and distress. They recall the great assistance that has been given them which has restored domestic tranquillity, promoted the general welfare, and established a more even justice—the prime purposes of our Government."

Now, in this year of our Lord 1940, we assemble here again, we assemble in typical American style, to find and express the will of the Democrats of this Nation, to again put forth a platform of principles, and to select candidates to present them for the cause of our country and our party.

What condition do we now find? Where in 1932 and even in 1936 we were troubled and depressed in large measure by domestic problems alone, we are now face to face with a condition which even the Dark Ages, with the pall of gloom and despair settled over the earth blotting out all but the seed of learning—which Providence saved for the revival of mankind—held nothing worse than this. It is with the march—the onward and oppressive march—of totalitarian philosophy that we are now so concerned. I used a while ago the whole expression "the year of our Lord" deliberately. While in all democratic countries, and anyway in our own country, we recognize the omnipotent power of a Supreme Being, the dictator conceives no higher power, no supreme authority, nothing greater than his own whim or decree. Ours is a Republic—no other kind of government—a constitutional democracy. Liberty has never been won except by the blood of men who hold it as something dearer than life itself and they who did not themselves achieve it but only enjoy it are seldom capable of appraising it at its true worth. Today we are encompassed about with practically the whole world at war, with overwhelming tragedy and calamity visited upon the peoples and nations in other lands. These things we cannot shut from our view because it is an intolerable situation for us, a free people, to witness, and a situation that we can never bear in our own land.

We have seen in the past 3 years the steady march of a philosophy of force. Force that says "might makes right" because with force you can destroy, and in the last 3 months we have seen this destruction in unlimited action. In the language of our great President, the machine has become the master. Nation after nation has been stricken by and has succumbed to this force. Sedition and treason thrive amid the decadence of the people. Liberty is no longer there.

In Germany a dictator, by artifice and accident in power, is as merciless as any tyrant in history. By vicious and insidious methods of influence and propaganda, he destroys the spirit of the people. With suppression of all individual freedom of thought and action, he subverts these governments. One by one in heartbreaking regularity and rapidity, these nations have fallen like straws in the wind. Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Holland, Norway, Belgium, and France are prostrate, their governments disrupted, the morale of their people completely destroyed, ground under the heels of this philosophy of force in action. In Italy another dictator, drunk with power, springs on an already helpless people to divide the spoils of their devastation. Civilians, innocent people, women and children, ruthlessly killed and maimed. Today even the very existence of the British Empire is threatened—sadly threatened.

What does all this mean to us? We are, as a people, opposed to any war except one of defense of our own institutions in our own country, and the countries protected under the Monroe Doctrine. But this Republic is founded on the basis that men are free—free to speak and act and think and worship. This was never intended to be the land of a weak or a faint-hearted race but of one strong and virile, hardy, unafraid, clean-minded, and clear-minded, firmly grounded in the moralitics and ideas which are the inheritance of its blood. Are we equal to this test? We are and must be equal to the test to which we are now put, but we must meet it with devotion to our duties to our country—our ideals—to sacrifice, to suffer, to fight, and even to die to save our own democracy, our own institutions in our own land. We must reinvigorate ourselves and guard the elements of Americans which have made them stalwart, worthy to hold and to keep these liberties—worthy to govern themselves and to preserve this Republic.

Our party has never espoused expediency to dodge principles or constructive ideals. We favor liberal and progressive measures for the benefit and the general welfare of our citizens but we cannot blind our eyes to the signs about us. We have become accustomed to ease—at least to ease compared with the people of the rest of the world. We have had difficulties and troubles in our own land but our standard of living is high above that of the people of other countries. We did not, ourselves, in this generation, achieve our liberty but we must rededicate ourselves to these principles so we may realize the perils, the suffering and the sacrifice which those who did gain our liberty for us, made in order to gain that freedom. I hold that the simple virtues of those pioneers—their strength of body and mind—their willingness—nay—their resolution to stand for their principles and rights and to sacrifice and suffer to uphold them—to exalt their duties as citizens—are the elements of man that made this country great, rich, and independent. The exaltation of the material over the real values of right and reason, conscience and tolerance, is not the American way. It is the degeneration of the spiritual and real qualities of mankind that brings them ruin and helpless dependence on the edict of a dictator. "Steep are the steps slow-hewn in flintiest rock on which nations climb to power, but slippery those with gold down which they stumble to eternal mock."

Let us remember then that it is not the enervation of intellect but the enervation of character that causes great peoples to disappear from the face of the earth. It is our task to strive for a rebirth in our own selves of the hardy, homely, simple virtues—virtues that throw a luster over adversity and by the innate power and strength of which America has been wrought and builded.

It is our time and our duty to reawaken the spirit in ourselves, to take lesson from the startling and pitiable disclosures coming to us in every news story from Europe. We must defend our country in our country, not only by building machines, gearing our industry to match the overpowering death-dealing implements of modern warfare, but set ourselves to the task of rebuilding our characters to meet this crucial condition.

The American people will preserve their democracy because they believe in their democracy. You and I would shrink from facing in another world—the world that is to come—a ragged Continental soldier, in the form the redeemed may wear, whose spirit had ascended from a battlefield of the Revolution, if we had not kept as a holy thing the doctrine of liberty for which the majority of the soldiers of Washington made their sacrifice.

There are two remarkable lines in a play by Maxwell Anderson which pictures Washington at Valley Forge in the darkest hour of that cruel winter with all the misery and suffering of his men before his eyes. In sadness, in gloom, but with his great heart still beating with courage and his unconquerable will still resolute, in the lines he says:

"This liberty will look easy by and by when nobody dies to get it."

I give you this sentiment because it professes the profound truth. There is a moral law which makes effort the price and touchstone of all substantial things.

It would put our minds in a purer air if we turned in these troublous times oftener to Washington. From the walls of homes and public places over the land, his strong, calm face looks down upon us and in it we may read, not warning or rebuke, but appeal that we keep the country safe, respectful of law, faithful in its justice, jealous in the protection of the rights of every citizen—even the humblest—and in season and out of season devoted to the conception of freedom and constitutional limitations of powers on which its government is founded.

We, the delegates from Texas, believe the Democratic Party is the only instrumentality that you and I can use to reconsecrate ourselves to meet the task before us. Today, next week, and next November, the people of our country will approve this statement: In offering our candidate for the nomination of this great party for the highest office in the world, we do so in the real and sincere belief that we can give the party the kind of man, with the kind of character who can, during these next 4 strenuous years, render the greatest service to his party and his country and furnish the kind of leadership imperatively required to direct its affairs.

This is indeed a time ordinarily for young men, but in a crisis of this nature we believe there is no substitute for experience—the experience that makes rugged character. Here we have a man in whose veins courses the blood of the pioneer—the pioneer woman, whose spirit, courage, and ambition impelled her to bring her six fatherless children in a prairie schooner 600 miles over trackless and dangerous roads from the great State of Tennessee—the State that gave us Sam Houston as well—to seek a home for herself and her children in the prairies of northeast Texas.

Here in simple country fashion she desired to rear these children to become real American citizens. There, in a log cabin built by his pioneer grandmother from Tennessee, near Blossom Prairie in Red River County, Tex., our candidate was born. Exposed to the rigors and hard work then common to the country youth, he had the chance to equip his mind and heart with the plain virtues that go to make up the character of a boy raised on a farm in that day. When old enough, he began the study of law. He was admitted to the bar, then moved to southwest Texas, nearer the frontier of our country. He became the county judge in Uvalde County, then a member of the State legislature, and in 1902 the voters of his district elected him as a Member of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States. Elected and reelected 15 times, he served continuously for 30 years and with conspicuous success. He was a member of the most important committees, Foreign Affairs and Ways and Means and others. He became minority leader of his party and in 1931 he climaxed his congressional career by being elected Speaker of the House. He was the confidential friend and adviser during the last World War of our beloved President Woodrow Wilson. Finding him well versed in the business of the House and wise and patient in his decisions, the President made an engagement to meet him twice a week at the White House and this schedule was adhered to during the entire period of the war. He has the experience, the knowledge, and the capacity, as well as the character and the courage, to lead our people in these times. He possesses the rugged characteristics of other men born on earlier frontiers who have lived to be the President of their country—such as Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln. Honesty of thought and purpose, sincerity of action, and steadfastness and candor in every engagement of life, marks the record of our candidate.

He has now served nearly 8 years as the Vice President of the United States. During his incumbency as Vice President, this office has risen in importance to where it is, in reality, second only to that of the President. He has added his voice to the councils of the administration in Cabinet meetings and as President of the Senate, and not since the day of Thomas Jefferson, the founder of our party, has there been a Vice President who has attained the position of importance, of influence, and of national significance as our candidate. He has manifested loyalty, sagacity, and steadfastness. No man is entitled to more credit for assisting in the passage of the legislative enactments of this administration for the general welfare of our people than our candidate. He has been publicly applauded many times for his active assistance by the leaders of our great party. He is a plain American, risen from modest and humble beginnings to become one of the most influential men of the day and he has achieved this place by the practice of his rugged American virtues. He is a patriot and a statesman of the highest order. As an example of his patriotism and his nature, during the dark days of the depression he made this significant statement:

"Politics will be a secondary consideration. Country should always come ahead of party, and now the country should be the sole thought of everyone."

He is a liberal Democrat—and has been a liberal Democrat for many years in Congress. He believes in equality of opportunity for every American citizen. He believes in necessary legislation and regulation for the protection of the weak against the strong—the poor against the rich—the owner of property against those who would destroy the ownership of property.

Our candidate has the personal friendship and confidence of as many Members of Congress in both Houses—and in both parties—as any other man who could be presented to this convention.

If we are to survive as a democracy—and we shall survive—it is because the citizens of the United States will never lose their liberty; when spurred to action they will guard and keep it as their pioneer fathers and forefathers gained these rights by sacrifice and suffering. We are the last hope of the democratic way of life, and we must, as American citizens, realize that upon us depends the hope of a free people throughout the world. We offer our candidate to you in the belief, in the absolutely confident belief, that he is a man who, under these conditions, is preeminently fitted and qualified for this office.

It is my privilege and honor, my fellow countrymen, delegates to this Democratic convention, on behalf of the State of Texas, to present to you her distinguished citizen, our neighbor and our friend, a man whom we deem well worthy, a man loved, admired, and respected throughout this land, a wise, practical, experienced, patriotic American citizen, the Honorable JOHN NANCE GARNER, of Texas.

The Vote on the Bridges Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including copies of editorials taken from the Okanogan Independent of Okanogan, Wash., together with a letter written by myself to that paper, a copy of the Bridges deportation bill, and the telegram which I sent to the Spokane American Legion post, all of which appeared in this same newspaper.

I might say that the editors and publishers of this paper, Mr. O. H. Woody and Mr. Harley Heath, are men of exceptionally high character and are fair-minded.

On July 22, 1940, soon after the Bridges bill was voted upon in this House, the following editorial appeared in the Okanogan Independent:

WHY THAT BRIDGES VOTE?

People of the Fifth District are distinctly not pleased with the vote of Congressman LEAVY against the measure to deport Harry Bridges. It is true that the vote was overwhelmingly in favor of booting the troublemaking Australian out of the country, and equally true that Judge LEAVY, with no C. I. O. strength in his district, could not have been influenced by fear of the C. I. O. in casting his vote, but the people of the district, whom he represents, are entitled to know the reason for the vote.

Bridges has undoubtedly caused the people of the Pacific coast more trouble, more financial loss, and has engendered more class hatred than any other individual. While he has been doing all these things, many times consorting with communistic elements in the process, he has failed to seek American citizenship.

Americans are an easy going and tolerant people—too much so for their own good, sometimes—but they are fed up with the antics of alien troublemakers.

As far as this district is concerned, it joins with most of the other congressional districts in the country in favoring the immediate deportation of Bridges and all his kind.

We note the statement of Attorney General Robert H. Jackson in opposition to the Bridges deportation. "It would be," he says, "the first time since the alien and sedition laws a century and a half ago that any law would provide for deportation without a hearing and without, indeed, the slightest pretense toward giving the accused what our Nation has long known as due process of law."

Mr. Jackson is undoubtedly sincere in his view of the rights of aliens, but his reasoning is faulty. The Constitution does not guarantee to aliens the same rights that are guaranteed to citizens and an alien visitor here should not expect with impunity to foment trouble.

On June 26 I addressed a letter to the editors of this paper and enclosed a copy of a telegram I had previously sent to the Spokane Legion Post and a copy of the Bridges bill, which read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 26, 1940.

EDITOR, INDEPENDENT:

In your issue of the Independent on June 22 you have an editorial entitled "Why the Bridges Vote?" Your editorial is very fair and I certainly do not find fault with it. You state that the people are entitled to know the reason for my vote and they are. I am sending you herewith a copy of a telegram in response to one received from the Spokane Legion Post, which concisely sets forth my position, and I would be glad to have you give it publicity.

Incidentally, I might state that in the last paragraph of your editorial wherein you state that the Constitution does not guarantee to aliens the same rights that are guaranteed the citizens, you are in error. In reference to due process which is guaranteed to all persons by the provisions of the fifth and fourteenth amendments, and likewise the prohibition against a denial of the writ of habeas corpus, or the enactment of a bill of attainder, ex post facto law, apply alike to all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States. There is an unbroken line of court decisions beginning back in the earliest years of our national existence supporting the statements that I have just made. Upon second thought, your own experience will indicate that, because all civil and criminal proceedings in our courts are carried on in exactly the same manner whether the litigants be citizens or aliens.

I might add that we have in this session passed two measures, either of which would be broad enough to care for the Bridges problem.

Again let me express my appreciation of the fair manner in which you approach this whole problem.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES H. LEAVY, M. C.

P. S.—Am enclosing copy of bill. It requires no lawyer to see the dangerous implications to such laws:

"An act to direct the deportation of Harry Renton Bridges

"Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Attorney General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to take into custody forthwith and deport forthwith to Australia, the country of which he is a citizen or subject, the alien, Harry Renton Bridges, whose presence in this country the Congress deems hurtful.

"Passed the House of Representatives June 13, 1940.

"Attest:

"SOUTH TRIMBLE, Clerk."

TELEGRAM TO SPOKANE POST

Your telegram received regard Bridges vote. Evidently provisions of bill not understood at home. No veteran or citizen can be more opposed to communism or nazi-ism than I am. The House has passed a bill, for which I voted, whereby Bridges could be deported if charges against him are proven. The bill about which you wire is unique in that such a bill was never passed in the 152 years of our Government, where Congress voted a man guilty without charging an offense or giving him any right of a hearing. Our forefathers knew the danger of bills of attainder and denial of the writ of habeas corpus. They protected us against its dangers by the provisions of the Constitution. Bridges was not an issue in my vote, but the sacredness of the American Constitution which I have sworn to uphold, was. I have resisted any encroachment upon the rights of the legislative branch of our Government by the judiciary or the Executive. In this case I voted against destruction of judicial functions by the legislative branch. Periods of hate and national emergencies often threaten to overthrow fundamentals of our democratic principles.

Totalitarian and communistic governments issue decrees of guilt and punishment. America passes laws and the guilt and punishment are fixed by judicial decisions. The only way to preserve the long-established safeguards of liberty and government by law are to preserve the Constitution and not to destroy it.

CHARLES H. LEAVY, M. C.

Subsequent to the receipt of my letter the editors of the Okanogan Independent on July 13 wrote and published the editorial which follows:

THE VOTE EXPLAINED

In response to an editorial question about his vote on the bill to deport Harry Bridges, Congressman CHARLES H. LEAVY has written the Independent giving full facts in the matter and enclosing a copy of the bill which he voted against.

It's a brief bill and it directs the Attorney General to deport Bridges "notwithstanding any other provisions of law."

Obviously it is a bad bill, and Judge LEAVY was absolutely right in voting against it. Imagine an American Congress deliberately passing a law which instructs an agent of the American Government to disregard any other laws which might touch on the same subject. It took political courage to vote as LEAVY did on the matter in view of the fact he has no C. I. O. strength in his district to support such a vote.

We don't know who introduced the bill, but it is amazing to find that any man intelligent enough to be elected to Congress would write it, or that a large majority of the Members of Congress would favor it.

And this is no endorsement of Harry Bridges. He ought to be deported forthwith on the strength of legislation already on the statute books. Judge LEAVY said in his letter to this paper:

"I might add that we have in this session passed two measures, either of which would be broad enough to care for the Bridges problem."

These editorials show an exceptional degree of fairness and openmindedness on the part of the editors of this paper and a type of patriotism not actuated by hysteria that is commendable and which has in times past, and which will in years to come, carry this country through its critical periods.

Roosevelt and Wallace

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY TIMES

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include an editorial from the Chicago Daily Times of July 19, 1940, which presents an unusually fine analysis of the situation as to the two major political parties.

The editorial follows:

[From the Chicago Daily Times of July 19, 1940]

ROOSEVELT AND WALLACE

On the noisy, hot, short-tempered crowd of delegates and spectators at the stadium a sudden hush fell when Senator BARKLEY announced the President of the United States. Into the quiet came the best-known voice in the Nation—"It is with a very full heart that I speak to you tonight * * *."

For nearly 40 minutes some 30,000 people sat in a historic silence listening to the grave words of the great leader who has guided the Nation through nearly 8 turbulent years. At times the stillness was like that of a great cathedral. For the first time in history, an American President was telling why he was willing to go to the voters for a third term. And when the voice died away, asking the Divine blessing upon the American people "as they face the future with courage and with faith," there was an exultant fervor in the mighty roar which arose.

The magic in Roosevelt's voice, the magnetism of his personality, still are potent. The pull may not be as great as it was in 1936. Only time can tell that. There were some disgruntled and angry delegates when the gavel fell. But outside the shattered ranks of the reactionaries, crushed by the final blow of Henry A. Wallace's nomination for the Vice Presidency, most of the anger and soreness, we believe, arose from a sense of frustration and will pass.

Politicians of the practical school are accustomed to fixing things up to suit themselves. By the very nature of their calling these practical men are arrogant and high-handed. They arrange and then induce the people to accept.

And the practical politicians didn't arrange things at this convention. The practical politicians got pushed around. For the moment they feel that they were pushed around by President Roosevelt and his close followers—just as the practical politicians left Philadelphia feeling that they were pushed around by Wendell Willkie.

In truth it was not Mr. Willkie or Mr. Roosevelt who did the pushing. It was a much mightier—and, to the politicians, a much more alarming force. It was public opinion, a terrible, unseen, uncontrollable force which took matters out of the hands of the politicians.

POLITICIANS DON'T UNDERSTAND WALLACE

The practical politicians among the delegates had already bowed to the people insofar as Mr. Roosevelt's renomination was concerned, long before they came to Chicago. But it was hard for them to swallow Henry Wallace. They do not understand Mr. Wallace, whom somebody once called a mystic mathematician. They cannot understand a hard-headed, successful farmer combined with a brilliantly intellectual liberal idealist—and the combined whole completely indifferent to practical politics.

But President Roosevelt wanted Wallace to round out the triumph of liberalism over reactionism. And the politicians sensed, somehow, the grim public demand to make the Democratic Party genuinely, not superficially, liberal. So resentfully and reluctantly they yielded.

The reason Mr. Roosevelt wanted Mr. Wallace as his running mate was plain throughout the President's address last night. He wanted him as a strong aid in the fight to preserve liberal and democratic institutions against attack from within and from without. He said:

"Whenever tyranny has replaced a more human form of government, it has been due more to internal causes than external. Democracy can thrive only when it enlists the devotion of those whom Lincoln called the common people. Democracy can hold that devotion only when it adequately respects their dignity by so ordering society as to assure to the masses of men and women reasonable security and hope for themselves and for their children."

That is the battle that lies ahead. There will be attempts to becloud the issues. The people will be told that the only important thing today is to put in office a businessman with whom industry will cooperate in rearming the Nation. They will be told that social progress must be abandoned in the name of national defense. They will be told that the third-term tradition is too sacred to violate.

But the President has drawn the battle line. No nation can survive unless its institutions, its ideals, its services to all its people make it worth defending to the last drop of every citizen's blood. That is what must be done before we can be strong and safe in national unity.

"The American people must decide whether these things are worth making sacrifices of money, of energy, or self. They will not decide by listening to mere words or reading mere pledges, interpretations, and claims. They will decide on the record—the record as it has been made—the record of things as they are."

That is where Franklin D. Roosevelt rests his case. We think that is where it should rest.

An Oregon Pioneer Answers Hitler

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER M. PIERCE
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 5, 1940

ADDRESS BY W. L. GOSSLIN

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address at Champoeg, before the Sons and Daughters of Oregon Pioneers, by W. L. Gosslin, Portland attorney, July 4, 1940:

A few days ago a little Austrian stood before the impressive tomb in Paris of a little Corsican adventurer who 125 years ago terrorized Europe. What must have been the thoughts of Adolf Hitler as he thus stood in triumph in the presence of the dead Emperor Napoleon? Within a brief period of 7 years Hitler has lifted Germany from a position of crushing military defeat, political impotence, and economic chaos to the hegemony of continental Europe. As he stood there under the vast dome of the Pantheon, did he recall that for 15 years Napoleon dominated Europe, holding in his grasp France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Portugal, the Low Countries, Switzerland, the Austrian Empire, Denmark, Poland, and large parts of Russia? Did he think of Napoleon's dreams of world empire that led him on past his victories at Marengo, Ulm, Austerlitz, Jena, Wagram, Borodino, to the retreat from Moscow, to Leipzig, and to Waterloo? Did Hitler think of the crushing of Napoleon's plan to conquer England by Admiral Nelson at Trafalgar? Did the black marble tomb remind Der Fuehrer of Elba and of St. Helena?

On May 10, 1940, in his order of the day to the German armies invading the Low Countries, Hitler declared: "The fight which begins today will decide the fate of the German Nation for the next thousand years." Does Hitler imagine himself in a Europe of A. D. 962 to 1250, when the Germans were the masters of western Christendom? He speaks frankly of the "consolidation of Europe"—obviously under Nazi domination. This means the formation of some half dozen large countries out of the some twenty large and small ones we have now—the consolidation of the Balkan States into one federation and of the Scandinavian countries into another. It means the disappearance in their present form of Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland. Hitler gave the clue when he told the nations of the world to withdraw their diplomatic representatives from Brussels, The Hague, Luxembourg, Copenhagen, and Oslo and stated that after July 15 representation at Berlin was all that was necessary. This is the Versailles Treaty in reverse. This is the rebirth of a holy Roman empire—at once more vast and infinitely more cruel.

We know the fate of the French, Belgians, Dutch, Danes, and Norwegians from what has already happened to the Czechs and the Poles. They are to be slaves of the German Reich. Refugees have told us of the removal from Poland to Germany of the art treasures, of family heirlooms—in fact, of every article of value. Nazi efficiency is so remarkable that scientific instruments purchased in Germany by Polish scientists have been checked through the original sales records and have been confiscated.

But by far the most ghastly aspect of Hitler's methods for the "consolidation of Europe," is the apparently studied effort to remove all possible sources of opposition in the conquered countries—the mass murders of the intelligentsia and of all individuals and groups from which leadership might be expected to come. A German army officer told an American friend that Poland was one huge graveyard and that he shuddered to think of the fate of the Poles left to the "tender" mercies of the Gestapo. For every German killed, 100 Poles, whether guilty or innocent, are to die. A rebel Czech or Pole, before his own execution, hears the shrieks of indescribable agony and despair of his own wife, mother, and children and sees the torture of their quivering flesh by methods that make the inhumanities of the Spanish Inquisition pale into insignificance. By such devices does Hitler seek to glorify the German Volk, and to provide for them "lebensraum" (living space).

Europe is to be a vast concentration camp, with the good German people cast by Hitler in the role of the hated Gestapo. Liberty and Democracy everywhere are to be trampled under the heels of the ceaselessly advancing Panzer and Schnell divisions, marching forward to "blitzkrieg" civilization. The peace of Hitler is the peace of death and the sword. Truth must abdicate in favor of propaganda; science must be the handmaid of war. The Reich is to be everything; the individual, nothing. Motherhood is to be merely a convenient device for the production of cannon fodder. Christianity and freedom of worship are to be relegated to the ashcan, already occupied by freedom of speech, of press, and of assembly. Treachery, bribery, falsehood, intimidation, torture, starvation, mass murder, and death are to be the instruments of "progress." And throughout the land, full play is to be given to the fury of 21 years of pent-up bitterness, hatred, and revenge, culminating in one mighty outburst of evil triumphant. Such is Adolf Hitler's plan for the world.

There are others who have had different plans and used different methods. We are gathered here today to pay the tribute of our admiration and love to our pioneer mothers and fathers who founded on the shores of the Pacific this great State. Think of the courage and patriotism of that handful of men and women 3,000 miles from the seat of their Government, separated by trackless forests and deserts, alone in a strange land, dominated by the mighty Hudson's Bay Co., the agency of a rival power. The first action of those pioneers on coming to Oregon, after the erection of their homes had been the building of schools and churches. They were a devout and Christian people, devoted to education and to democratic ideals. And so they formed a government that should be the servant, and not the master, of the people; a government that should cherish the rights of every individual, no matter how lowly; a government that should protect the weak and helpless from the depredations of the wicked, the cruel and the strong; a government that should guarantee to all, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, under the guiding star of justice and truth. That Government for this great Oregon country, which included what are now the States of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and parts of Montana and Wyoming, was established without shedding one drop of human blood. What a contrast with Hitler's conquests which have bathed a continent in blood and tears! To the maintenance of that Government of ours, we here pledge our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor. The glorious flag of freedom, planted here by our fathers, must never cease to wave over this emerald land.

And what would be the answer of those Oregon pioneer mothers and fathers to Adolf Hitler? Atop our State Capitol stands a symbol of them, the Golden Pioneer. As he surveys the beautiful peaceful Oregon countryside let him speak for us all:

"Adolf Hitler—we know you of old. You breathe the spirit of Genghis Khan, of Tamerlane, of Attila the Hun, Caesar, Charlemagne, of Otto the Great, and Frederick Barbarossa, of Czar Peter of Russia, and of Frederick, the Prussian King. You drink the wine of violence. As you stand there at the Corsican's tomb you believe that you are a new Napoleon. But where are all those conquerors now? They are dust, as you will be one day; their empires disintegrated, their bloody victories, legends but faintly remembered. What rolling field is to be your Waterloo? What rock-bound isle is to be your St. Helena? In humanity's long march down the centuries it has seen the conquerors come, and it has seen them go. That mighty procession of historic humanity, which soon forgets the conqueror, will always cherish the memory of a Hugo Grotius, the father of international law, of a Goethe, of a Martin Luther, a Wagner, a Gutenberg, a Bach, Brahms, or Beethoven, of an Einstein, a Thomas Mann, a Roentgen, a Hans Holbein, or an Albrecht Durer. A humanity that has already forgotten Emperor William Hohenzollern, sawing wood at the castle of Doorn, will never forget Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink.

"And so today as I, the Golden Pioneer, stand on my pedestal atop the State Capitol, watching the beautiful Willamette flow eternally onward to the sea, admiring the mighty forests of Oregon which have seen a thousand conquerors pass from the face of the earth, I know that beneath me, in this white marble citadel of freedom, the democratic institutions of government and of law will still be serving humanity long after you, Adolf Hitler, are dust, and your proud achievements only a myth among men!"

Walkers and Bolters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. ORVILLE ZIMMERMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. CLYDE WILLIAMS, OF MISSOURI

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a statement made by my colleague, Hon. CLYDE WILLIAMS, Representative of the Eighth District of Missouri, and which was published in the Missouri Democrat under date of August 2, 1940, which is as follows:

Having nominated the head of a Power Trust holding company from Wall Street as its candidate for President, the Republican Party, through its big newspaper writers and radio commentators, is having a strenuous time these hot days trying to build him up. He is first hurried away to Colorado where he is pictured around chuck wagons and hot-dog stands, where he is placed on old stage coaches and paraded before rodeos in order that he may be his natural self and where he wisecracks and plays low politics. They want to get this glamour boy from Wall Street out into the great open spaces of the West and try to fool the people into thinking he is one of them.

Then these same papers that were chagrined, peeved, and in fact infuriated because they could not catapult Roosevelt out of the Democratic nomination like they "blitzkrieged" Willkie into the Republican nomination, now are bringing all their ingenuity and skill into the build-up picture for the Republican candidate.

They have started a walking marathon and a bolting battalion composed of supposed Democrats who are acclaimed as leaving the party. Who are they? They mention as a sample of those who are going to take a walk such ancient and venerable pedestrians as Al (good loser) Smith, John (doubtful) Raskob, Jouett (Liberty League) Shouse, and our Jim (ex-Senator) Reed. No one had ever discovered that these veteran political amblers had got back from the last walk they took. These men and their type are seasoned and experienced walkers. For years they have been on the march away from the ideals of democracy toward the citadel of special privilege and it is expected that a great utility magnate will receive them with open arms and bestow upon them his blessings at the end of the rough and footsore journey. It is hoped that he will keep them within his fold so that in the future there may be no more shoe leather wasted on these long, intermittent, and futile walks.

Then these same newspapers, backed up by the radio commentators, mention, as an example, those who are bolting the Democratic party, Senator BURKE of Nebraska, Senator HOLT of West Virginia, and "Alfalfa" Bill Murray of Oklahoma, all of whom recently were candidates in their own States and all of whom were overwhelmingly defeated by the Democrats at home who know them. The Democrats in their own community beat them to the bolt. This little group of bolters has openly gone over to the party which it for years has so faithfully served. These lame ducks with their soiled and tarnished plumage present a dull, a colorless, and a sorry scene as they waddle and toddle along the dusty path in their wild confusion and scramble to reach Mr. Willkie's "old swimmin' hole."

These writers and commentators who are trying to build up Willkie by this talk of walks and bolts from the Democratic Party seem to think that the people have no memory at all and are utter and total fools. The people are not deceived. They know that the Democratic Party has lost nothing by the action of these so-called walkers and bolters.

A Liberal Trade Policy and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON, OF KANSAS

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my speech on A Liberal Trade Policy and National Defense:

A LIBERAL TRADE POLICY AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

The liberal trade program carried out by the United States has as its main purpose the facilitation and stimulation of peaceful commerce between nations. However, even before the present war flamed into destruction over half the earth's surface and disrupted peacetime commerce, trade agreements were both directly and indirectly forwarding the American program of national defense. Nations cannot be made strong by armaments alone. A well-rounded national economy must run parallel to military defense. In order to be prepared, nations must make use of their natural resources, produce and distribute goods efficiently. It has been demonstrated that no armies, navies, tariffs, or embargoes can defend us from invasions of depressions, which lead to lower standards of living. It is recognized that prosperity and peace go hand in hand; to promote one, promotes the other. Any program which creates greater prosperity, greater commercial freedom, and higher standards of living is the best sort of defense against all kinds of invasions. Such economic security helps to eliminate the conditions which make greater military defense necessary and at the same time strengthens military defense.

More directly, the trade-agreements program has contributed to the solution of some of the problems of national defense and security by facilitating the acquisition from abroad of certain materials such as manganese, mica, and nickel, vital to our national defense, which are not and cannot adequately be produced in the United States itself.

Private business in the United States not only carries on the international commerce of this country in peacetime, but bears a heavy responsibility for the operation of the national-defense program when the country lies under the threat of hostilities.

The aim and effect of the trade-agreements program are and have been to facilitate commerce carried on by private business, to remove the obstructions and barriers which grew up and throttled that commerce in the twenties and early thirties, and to enable private business to fulfill its proper functions in the handling of foreign trade. Under a democracy private business is geared to conduct such commerce more efficiently and more expeditiously than Government agencies.

Under the excessive tariff policy that culminated in the passage of the Hawley-Smoot Act of 1930, the United States took a leading roll in the world-wide rush to throw barriers and obstructions across the channels of normal world commerce. Under that policy "pressure groups," by log-rolling tactics, were able to obtain exorbitant rates of tariff on a great number of products—including some that are necessary to the military defense of this country. Such tariffs have been imposed on certain products such as nickel, mercury, and quinine that are not produced in the United States in quantities adequate to meet defense needs. The main results of such trade restrictions were to increase the costs to American industries and consumers, to retard national defense, and to throttle both our foreign trade and our domestic economy, because when the United States barred normal imports by excessive tariffs, such action likewise shut off the exports of the things which this country produces in surplus. It caused huge farm surpluses to pile up in this country and force down farm prices; it caused factories by the hundreds to close down and threw American industrial workers into the breadlines.

This so-called tariff protection was granted under the pretext that it would strengthen domestic industry for peacetime and national preparedness against emergency. Excessive tariffs have done neither. Rather they have restricted trade, increased poverty and engendered hostility between countries. The record of the twenties and early thirties gives ample evidence that tariff retaliations encouraged the present situation in Europe; it is not necessary to go into the details of that record. The so-called tariff protection is a misnomer of the worst sort; it protected no one from the poverty conditions such as existed in 1932.

Both our economy and our national defense were injured by the Hawley-Smoot policy. It is obvious that a country in which business is bad, where workers are unemployed, and farmers are going bankrupt is not a strong country if called upon to defend itself.

The Hawley-Smoot tariff policy did not make the United States self-sufficient and strong; it did not even bring about self-sufficiency in the essential materials for national defense, notwithstanding the fact that tariffs on some such materials were increased.

Those who were responsible for the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act do not like to have that act exposed as one of the causes of world-wide economic warfare that has led to the present military conflict. But the chronology of events and the established record tell the story all too plainly. It is a well-established fact that the Hawley-Smoot Act was followed by retaliatory measures by foreign countries all over the globe. The abrupt ending of our unsound foreign-loan policy at about the same time also had an unsettling effect. All nations concerned about their economic security were likewise concerned about their political security and took restrictive measures intended to protect their own depressed industries. Such steps included tariff isolation, exchange and quota regulations, and many other artificial and uneconomic restrictions. As their normal international commerce was lost, these countries were driven to barter and similar programs. American foreign trade suffered a decline even more drastic than that of the rest of the world. European and Asiatic countries were driven off the gold standard and began a race of depreciating their currencies, thus adding to the confusion in international trade.

Complete national self-sufficiency, as advocated by some persons, is too costly to be sought for unless under absolute military necessity. When military necessity—or government by a dictatorship—demands national self-sufficiency it means lower standards of living for all the people, complete regimentation, a loss of the rewards of individual enterprise in business and industry, strict mobilization of the productive power of the Nation along the lines ordered by the Government. Even the step toward isolation represented by excessive tariffs on imports of necessary commodities tends toward this effect.

Self-sufficiency means high costs of production and higher prices; these high costs tend to decrease consumption and thus lower living standards. When a country has to use a greater share of its productive energy in the production of war essentials it spends a greater portion of its national income for those essentials and naturally has a smaller share left for other goods.

The price of self-sufficiency is well illustrated by the high cost of the gasoline that Germany has been producing from coal. Germany's "ersatz" program indicates national inefficiency to the extent represented by the value of the goods she could produce efficiently and exchange with other countries for the goods she cannot produce efficiently. Such self-sufficiency is often a confession of national inefficiency, yet we have many in this country who advocate just this sort of national inefficiency. Every time a tariff revision is undertaken by the Congress, efforts are made to make productive inefficiency a virtue. This is attempted in the name of "military necessity," "protecting infant industries," or some other recognized vote-getting tariff slogan.

The reciprocal trade agreements program represents the antithesis of a self-sufficiency-at-all-costs economic philosophy. It represents a movement to free private business from the obstacles thrown in its way, and permits private business, within the framework of sound economic principles, to use its efficiency and its enterprise in the production and exchange of goods among nations, with the resultant increase in living standards for all countries.

So much for the more general considerations of the relationship of the trade-agreements program to national defense. The Army-Navy Munitions Board has classified certain materials as strategic and critical for defense purposes. According to the definition of the Board, strategic materials are those which are essential to national defense and which, in time of war, must be obtained in whole or in substantial part from sources outside the continental United States. Strict conservation and control of the distribution of such materials are necessary in time of war. Critical materials are those which are essential to the national defense, but which offer less difficult procurement problems than do the strategic materials, either because the critical materials are less necessary in the prosecution of a war, or because they can be obtained in more nearly adequate quantities from domestic sources. Some degree of conservation and control of distribution of these materials is necessary in wartime.

The list of strategic materials is as follows: Antimony, chromium, cocnut shell char, manganese, ferrograde, manila, fiber, mercury, mica, nickel, quartz crystal, quinine, rubber, silk, tin, and tungsten.

The critical materials are: Aluminum, asbestos, cork, graphite, hides, iodine, kapok, opium, optical glass, phenol, platinum, tanning materials, toluol, vanadium, and wool.

The imports of these 29 products in 1939 were valued at about $300,000,000 or approximately 15 percent of the total imports into the United States for that year. These items represent an important phase of United States import trade. Even in peacetime they are possibly more essential to our economy than the proportion in percentages might indicate.

The Army-Navy Munitions Board lists and keeps under surveillance certain additional materials which might at any time become strategic or critical materials. Some materials shift back and forth among the three categories, depending upon their availability and on whether substitutes for them are developed.

The trade-agreements program is related to these materials in the national-defense program in two specific ways: (1) By expanding foreign markets for our own products, with which to pay other countries for the essential materials we may purchase from them; and (2) by making it easier for American businessmen, in performing their part in the national defense, to acquire for the United States, at lower costs, the necessary quantities of essential materials. When United States tariffs on essential defense materials are lowered through a trade agreement, the cost of those materials to this country is also lowered.

Reductions in United States tariffs, or other concessions on imports, have been provided on several of the 29 essential materials cataloged by the Army-Navy Munitions Board under the trade-agreements program. Duties have been reduced on manganese, mica, nickel, graphite, and aluminum. In order to stabilize trade, rubber, tin, asbestos, quinine, kapok, chromite, and chrome ore were bound against duty assessment during the life of the agreements.

When national defense really is at stake, no one objects to a reasonable tariff subsidy on the production of strategic or critical materials within the United States. It is recognized, however, that no program of self-sufficiency can make the United States independent of outside sources for some of these materials. Defense was taken into consideration before reductions were made in the duties on these items. Past history shows that tariff subsidies, demanded in the name of national defense, ought to be carefully examined in order to make sure that such subsidies really look toward national security and not toward the financial security of selfish producers posing as patriots. This national-defense argument has been overworked in obtaining "defenseless tariffs" in the past.

MANGANESE

Possibly one of the best illustrations of the failure of high-tariff protection to bring about self-sufficiency in a material necessary to the national defense is the case of manganese. Notwithstanding a tariff subsidy of as high as 100 percent ad valorem over a period of many years, the United States has not produced more than 5 to 10 percent of the manganese needed for peacetime consumption in the steel industry of this country.

In considering the Tariff Act of 1922 the producers claimed that if manganese were given adequate tariff protection, they could produce in this country enough for our domestic requirements in peacetime. Notwithstanding another increase in the manganese tariff in response to this same claim in 1930 they never have produced in recent years more than 10 percent of the domestic requirements; the steel industry or, in final analysis, the consumers of steel products, paid an average of $6,650,000 a year tariff subsidy on the 90 or so percent of the domestic requirements being imported.

In the trade agreement with Brazil, the United States tariff on manganese was reduced by 50 percent. In spite of the fact that this product is vital to national defense, certain potential domestic producers continually protest against this reduction and go so far as to say that we could have had self-sufficiency in manganese if they had had "proper protection."

OPTICAL GLASS

The case of optical glass, a critical material, is interesting from the viewpoint of tariff protection and self-sufficiency. Domestic producers of such glass have enjoyed high tariff protection for many years but this infant industry has not grown to maturity under such shelter.

There is one domestic producer of optical glass in the United States, but this manufacturer has not developed the capacity to supply the present demands, so Congress recently appropriated $100,000 to enlarge a plant and to furnish new equipment for the National Bureau of Standards.

Apparently outright production by the Government would have been less expensive and more adequate for the purpose of national defense. As was brought out during the hearings on the Second Deficiency Appropriation bill (June 10, 1940), the National Bureau of Standards has been manufacturing some optical glass since the first World War and has supplied part of the Army and Navy requirements. Before the present war broke out, the United States obtained a part of its optical glass from Germany, France, and England.

As with manganese and other strategic and critical materials, no one quarrels with tariff subsidies on optical glass if real independence is gained. That, however, has not been the case. It merely constitutes another failure of so-called self-sufficiency under costly tariff subsidies. In addition, the Government, in time of emergency, finds it necessary to produce optical glass for its own needs.

It is elemental that tariff subsidies are invisible taxes paid by consumers in way of higher prices, not only on the portion which may be imported but upon the domestic supply as well. Tariff subsidies granted on the spurious plea of developing a domestic industry to the point of self-sufficiency, in many instances, instead of contributing to the national defense, have actually hampered it and have added to the cost of the very materials and supplies upon which defense must depend.

The trade-agreements program, on the other hand, has operated to facilitate the acquisition of essential materials at a lower cost and at the same time to promote the general business and industrial conditions within the United States which make for an economically as well as a militarily prepared Nation.

Administration of the Securities and Exchange Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE SAN FRANCISCO NEWS FINANCIAL

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news article from the San Francisco News Financial dated July 8, 1940:

FINANCE AND INDUSTRY—S. E. C. BLACKENS REPUTATIONS AND FAILS TO CORRECT ACCUSATIONS AFTER JURY CLEARS DEFENDANTS

(By John S. Piper, the News Financial editor)

More than 2 weeks have elapsed since all defendants in the cases of the United States of America against Robert S. Odell and 11 others affiliated with the Pacific States Savings & Loan Co. were acquitted by a jury under orders from the judge in a Federal district court in Los Angeles. The Securities and Exchange Commission, which gave wide publicity to the indictments, has not as yet issued an announcement that the men whose names it blackened last December were found not guilty.

This is in line with the public-relations policy of the S. E. C. and is convincing proof of the biased attitude prevalent in a bureaucratic agency which thrives on the publicity it chooses to release.

The S. E. C. in Washington maintains a press bureau which broadcasts a release whenever it participates in the indictment of an individual. The news release recites all the counts in the indictment and goes into detail to justify his prosecution.

If the accused man is convicted, it means another release, again reciting all of the accusations against him. When the convicted man is sentenced it issues still another release, again reciting his crimes.

But if the man who was indicted at the instance of the S. E. C. is acquitted, the news bureau in Washington does not issue a release to inform the public that the individual whose reputation it besmirched was found not guilty of the charges against him.

This arbitrary method of controlling publicity to its own advantage is one phase of the administration of the Securities and Exchange Commission which should be delved into when the next Congress investigates the S. E. C.

SEVEN-PAGE STATEMENT

Last December 20 the San Francisco regional office of the S. E. C. issued a release on the indictment of Mr. Odell and other defendants which was seven typewritten pages in length. The release consisted of a two-page statement by Howard A. Judy, regional S. E. C. administrator, three pages of biographical sketches of those indicted, with their ages, and a two-page statement of Ben Harrison, United States attorney at Los Angeles.

The December 20 statement, released by the S. E. C. here, placed the position of the accused men in the most unfavorable light possible.

"Howard A. Judy, Securities and Exchange Commission regional administrator, announced today," it said, "that a Federal grand jury in Los Angeles had returned a 19-count indictment, charging mail fraud, violation of the fraud provisions of the Securities Act and conspiracy to violate the mail-fraud statute, against 14 defendants in connection with the operation and sales of securities of Pacific States Savings & Loan Co.

"Robert S. Odell, the president, and 10 other officers and directors of the company and affiliated corporations, and Thomas M. Gannon and Erle Leaf, deputy building and loan commissioners of the State of California, and T. W. Dahlquist, prominent San Francisco attorney, were named as the defendants.

"COMPANY INSOLVENT

"The indictment charged the defendants with devising and employing a scheme to defraud investors and prospective investors in the company. * * * It charges that false financial statements were prepared and circulated by the defendants, and that the defendants misrepresented to investors and prospective investors that the company was solvent when it was in fact insolvent.

"It charges, further, that the defendants diverted the funds of investors to their own use and violated California statutes regulating the business of building and loan associations, and that they corruptly influenced legislators and administrators to take action favorable to the company and its management and detrimental to the interest of investors. * * *

"The Securities and Exchange Commission was represented by Roger Kent, attorney, and Allen G. Mainland, accountant investigator attached to the San Francisco regional office of the S. E. C."

The above is only a part of Mr. Judy's statement and only a small part of the seven-page press release.

If the S. E. C. were to depart from its policy of leaving reputations blackened even after the men it has accused have been acquitted, it would issue a press release immediately after the acquittal.

HOW IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN

The opinion of Judge Leon R. Yankwich in the Pacific States case, in which he ordered the jury to find the defendants not guilty, would have supplied material for a press release equally as long as the one the S. E. C. made public here last December.

Here is how the S. E. C. might have prepared such a release:

"'Howard A. Judy, Securities and Exchange Commission regional administrator announced today that a Federal jury in Los Angeles had acquitted all defendants who were indicted last December on charges of mail fraud, violation of the fraud provisions of the Securities Act, and conspiracy to violate the mail fraud statute in connection with the operation and sales of securities of Pacific States Savings & Loan Co.

"Federal Judge Leon R. Yankwich directed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty.

"The judge and the jury held that the defendants did not devise and employ a scheme to defraud investors and prospective investors, as charged in the indictments. The judge and the jury also decided that the defendants did not divert funds of investors to their own use, etc. * * *

"Judge Yankwich, in his opinion on the case at the end of the trial, said: 'There is not in this record any substantial evidence from which a jury can infer by any stretch of the imagination that any of the defendants in this case have been guilty of any of the fraudulent acts with which the Government of the United States has charged them.'"

Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1940

ARTICLE BY LEWIS P. MILLER

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, throughout the entire history of our Nation we have been able to raise an Army, a Navy, and the component parts thereof by voluntary enlistment. We have never been compelled to resort to any compulsory plan of conscription in order to raise our peacetime forces for national defense. We do not have to resort to any compulsory method, as proposed, to raise our peacetime Army for our national defense at this time. The men and boys of this Nation are ready and willing to answer the call of their country, under a voluntary-enlistment plan, for training purposes and for our national defense. Any plan of compulsory conscription at the outset, without giving the voluntary-enlistment plan a fair and equitable trial, is a challenge to the patriotism of our people.

While we need an army for our national defense in this Nation, we need an army of men and women, of every walk in life, who will march forward as Americans to aid in saving our Nation from every un-American influence from within.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial written by Mr. Lewis P. Miller, of Middletown, Ind., which appeared in the Middletown News, of Middletown, Ind., on a recent date, which is as follows:

WE DO NEED AN ARMY—A VOTING ARMY TO HELP PRESERVE FREE GOVERNMENT

(By Lewis P. Miller, R. F. D. 1, Mooreland)

Are we or are we not going to be transformed from a peaceful, individualistic nation of workers to a fighting, regimented army of soldiers to wage other people's wars? That is the question the United States Congress is now wrestling with and which it will probably settle one way or the other in a few days.

If a compulsory military training law is passed, it will be simply for one or two reasons. Either we are about to formally plunge into the European war with men as well as machines or President Roosevelt and his New Deal crew are making a last desperate effort to conceal their utter failure as navigators of the ship of state by stirring up a frenzy of militant patriotism just before election time.

No other possible explanation of this proposed legislation will hold water. This country is not threatened with invasion either now or as far as we can see into the future. Hitler has not whipped England yet. He has no navy with which to cross the ocean. He can't invade us with his present air force. Why then this un-American proposal to conscript soldiers when we are technically at peace with all the world?

If it is for the purpose of again participating in a European war, then why isn't President Roosevelt honest enough to say so? He is campaigning on a promise to refrain from such participation. But, judging from his past preelection pledges, if he were to start broadcasting every other day that he intended to send an army to Europe as soon as it could be embarked, we could feel much more confident that we were not heading for war.

Moreover, his statement to the Chicago convention disavowing any desire or purpose to run again is the most striking instance in American history of political duplicity on the part of an incumbent President. Everyone who heard it knew, the moment it was read, that it meant exactly the opposite of what it said. The fact seems to be that Mr. Roosevelt has developed such a habit of saying one thing and meaning another that the only way to correctly interpret his statements is to take them in reverse.

So when he insists that we need a conscript army to meet a foreign invader the only logical interpretation is that he means we need it to invade a foreign country. When he says everyone must be prepared to preserve the domestic peace, what he most probably means is that everybody should be ready to preserve the New Deal.

Such contortion of language is unworthy of the high office of the Presidency. When our Chief Executive has so perverted the truth that his most intimate henchmen take him to mean the opposite of what he says he no longer is a true representative of the American people—he can no longer be trusted to lead a great nation in the midst of a troubled world.

There are but few patriotic Americans who are not in favor of completely adequate defense for the United States. But there are a good many of us who do not believe that in order to have such a defense we must resort to totalitarian methods of acquiring it.

The New Deal is drunk with power. For 7 years it has squandered tens of billions of dollars of the people's money in an attempt to bribe them into docile submission to dictation from Washington. That attempt has not fully succeeded.

Thinking people in every part of the Nation are at last becoming aroused to the enormity of the danger of continuing the New Deal in power. They are revolting—here, there, and everywhere. And President Roosevelt is beginning to show signs of panic at what is happening. His supply of exhilaration—the power to govern largely by Executive order and spend billions upon billions of dollars in wild abandonment—is about to be taken from him. And, like a heavy toper about to be deprived of his bottle, Mr. Roosevelt is in a resentful and surly temper.

He has been making derogatory remarks about his former friends and supporters who can no longer stomach the New Deal and who have announced they will fight his efforts to continue in office indefinitely.

The greatest emergency facing the American people today is the situation created by a President who wants to be king. The people's interest in this emergency will not be served by conscripting a military army to fight in Europe but by enlisting a volunteer army to fight at the polls to preserve the American system of free, representative government.

President Roosevelt may have convinced himself that he is the only man in the United States capable of heading our Government. But he has the toughest job of his life ahead of him to so convince the American people.

Actors' Equity Association Asks for Dies Committee Investigation of Communists in the Theater

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, since the second demise of the W. P. A. theater project I have had considerable correspondence with members of the Actors' Equity Association, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and with many others in the entertainment profession as to the encroachment of Communists into key positions in that profession. Some startling information has recently come to me and I am hopeful that there will be a thoroughgoing investigation of this matter by the Committee on Un-American Activities.

In the meantime I wish to call the attention of the House to certain phases of my own investigation and offer the following correspondence.

My attention was first attracted to this situation by an extensive coverage of the last annual meeting of the Actors' Equity Association appearing in the association magazine, Equity. At this meeting the annual election of new members to the council occurred, and in reporting the meeting this magazine referred to certain functioning of Equity's election machinery which disturbed Philip Loeb, one of the seven council members whom I have accused of being a Communist. Loeb was particularly disturbed over the campaign against Sam Jaffe, but the magazine gave no hint as to the nature of the alleged campaign. It referred to it as charges and countercharges, so I looked into it and found a real fight had occurred on the propriety of electing Jaffe, another communist. Jaffe was accused of being a Communist, and did not deny the charge. However, none of these details were brought out in the official report of the meeting published in Equity, the only medium the council has of keeping its far-flung membership of over 4,000, scattered throughout the United States, informed of happenings in the New York headquarters.

Jaffe succeeded in winning the election and is now a duly qualified member of the council, as brought out in my remarks of July 4 and July 11 before the House.

ACTORS' EQUITY ASSOCIATION,
New York, July 10, 1940.

Representative WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: The press throughout the United States has given considerable publicity to certain statements allegedly made by you, and which we understand, have been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Newspaper clippings purporting to quote your remarks were brought to the attention of our council at its meeting yesterday, resulting in the adoption of the following resolution:

"Moved, seconded, and carried: That the council on behalf of itself and the membership denies emphatically that either the Equity council or the Equity membership is, or ever has been, dominated or controlled by Communists and requests that Congressman LAMBERTSON furnish satisfactory proof to the contrary or submit the source of his information."

We were instructed to convey this council action to you and to inform you that the Actors' Equity Association is not a political organization and that every actor and actress, eligible for membership, has never had any of their religious or political beliefs interferred with, and as the membership of Equity represents practically 100 percent of all actors and actresses in the American legitimate and musical-comedy theater, we feel, if you have been quoted correctly, that you have "smeared" not only the members of the council, whose names have been used, but the entire association.

The council and the membership feels that it has been unjustifiably attacked because our Americanism has never been challenged in this manner during the more than 30 years of our existence, and on behalf of the thousands of men and women that are Equity members, we call on you to comply with what is set forth in the resolution herein, or publicly retract this most unfair stigma, which it would appear from the newspaper reports, you are responsible for.

Permit us to point out that the character of this defamation is such that it may have serious consequences regarding not only the reputations of the people whose names it is alleged you have used, but their future career in the theater, with the resultant loss of employment. Indeed, we consider that all of us will be seriously damaged if this brand of "communism" which you have, according to the press, placed on us, is not removed.

Equity feels, very strongly, that men in high places, like yourself, who are supposed to represent fairly and without prejudice, the best interests of the citizenry of the United States, should be most careful, particularly at this time when there is so much hatred and conflict and misunderstanding going on in the world, to at least make some effort to establish and ferret out the true facts before they rise in the Congress of the United States to give voice to slanderous statements like those it is claimed you have made, and which have been echoed by the press and radio throughout the Nation.

Surely, as a fair-minded person and one of the lawmakers of our country, you will desire to right what this organization believes to be a grievous wrong, and we hereby give you the opportunity to do so; for after all, we only seek fairness and justice.

Very truly,

ACTORS' EQUITY ASSOCIATION,
PAUL DULLZELL,
Executive Secretary.

JULY 11, 1940.

PAUL DULLZELL,
Secretary, 45 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City:

Acknowledging your letter of yesterday kindly wire me names of members voting for and voting against resolution mentioned.

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

JULY 11, 1940.

PAUL DULLZELL,
Secretary, 45 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City.

DEAR MR. DULLZELL: I wired you today as follows: "Acknowledging your letter of yesterday kindly wire me names of members voting for and voting against resolution mentioned."

I noticed that this resolution quotes me as stating in my remarks of July 4, copy of which is enclosed, that the Equity Council is now "dominated or controlled by Communists."

Please advise me exactly how you read this from my statement of July 4.

Thanking you, I am
Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 11, 1940.

Representative WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON,
House of Representatives:

Cannot furnish information requested without authorization of council. All business transacted by council is considered confidential and no member of council has right to reveal what takes place when council is in session without council consent. We will of course submit your telegram at next council meeting which will be on July 23 and will be instructed what to do. However, this information should not have anything to do with your reply. The resolution was adopted by a majority of 19 to 5. We fail to see how the names of people present and voting has anything to do with council's request that you furnish satisfactory evidence or submit source of your information.

PAUL DULLZELL,
Executive Secretary, Actors' Equity Association.

Mr. Speaker, this refusal to furnish the names of the members was disappointing as the information would have helped me materially. When the council did meet, it also refused to permit me to have the names, as is brought out in succeeding correspondence. In order that the council could be more fully informed I wrote Mr. Dullzell under date of July 20, enclosing the following statement, which I requested him to read to the council. I had previously questioned the use of the words "dominate" and "control" in the resolution.

JULY 20, 1940.

TO THE COUNCIL MEMBERS OF ACTORS' EQUITY ASSOCIATION, New York City.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: It was with disappointment and considerable shock that I read the statements of your officials and the resolution of your council in response to my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 4. I cannot believe the careful reading of my statement could result in your answering resolution. I request therefore that my July 4 statement, my telegram and letter to Mr. Dullzell concerning your resolution, and my further remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 11 be read to you.

In common with many of my fellow Members of Congress, I have a great respect and affection for members of your profession. Actors have given me much enjoyment. Their warm-hearted generosity to many worth-while causes is well known. For many years Actors' Equity Association has enjoyed an enviable reputation as a fair-minded, liberal labor organization. I believe anyone familiar with the hearings and debates on the Federal theater project in 1939, knows the high esteem in which actors and the Equity Association were held by Members of Congress.

I believe it is well known why the theater project was eliminated from the W. P. A., and I think friends of the theater were justified in anticipating a cleaning out of subversive elements in the entertainment organizations. It was therefore shocking to realize that the Actors' Equity Association in the last year of the Federal Theater used the language, methods, and ideas of the Workers' Alliance and the Communist Party in its conduct and negotiations with Federal theater officials. It has been disappointing to me to see Equity's fine reputation besmirched in the public prints in the controversy over benefits for Finland, their refusal to cooperate in the production of the patriotic spectacle The American Jubilee, and the storm over possible affiliation with the Theater Arts Committee.

It is rather significant that at the very time your representatives were presumably assuring Congress that no possible "red" influence could again obtain control of a Federal theater project, a man was elected to your governing board who as recently as last August signed his name to a complete endorsement of the Soviet system. I refer to Sam Jaffe.

It is my belief, and I think the belief of many citizens of the United States, that New York City has nourished a small minority of Communist Party members and subservient party-line rubber stamps in the theater, the newspapers, and the arts. Although a minority, they have been successful in obtaining key positions in their organizations, where they carry on a consistent campaign of obstruction, troublemaking, and propaganda against our democratic institutions and ideals. Very often they use a professed belief in these ideals to destroy them. Witness their shrieks about civil liberties, and at the same time their hearty praise for Russia, where no liberties exist.

I cannot believe that the members of Actors' Equity Association, and most particularly the council, are entirely unaware of this subversive infiltration. Indeed, from newspaper clippings and other accounts of your election in May, it is my impression that Miss Talullah Bankhead was nominated to combat this constantly growing influence. Yet Miss Bankhead was defeated. Nowhere in your official Equity magazine do I see presented the issue on which Miss Bankhead states she was a candidate.

These facts lead me to believe that the officers and members of the Actors' Equity Association are complacent about, ignorant of, or in alliance with the Marxists, Communists, fellow travelers (label them as you will) who appear to be powerful enough to keep the Equity Association constantly in the public eye on distinctly communistic controversies.

I made my statement of July 4 to combat that complacency, or ignorance. I believe the actors and actresses of America deserve to know why the Federal theater project was banned and continues to be banned by Congress. I hoped that by giving them this information they would purge their organizations of this element in office. I regret that many fine actors and actresses in need may not be helped by a Government theater project until the Equity Association is finally and completely cleared of this "red" influence. It was to assist in bringing about this "consummation devoutly to be wished" that I made the statement.

As to the sources of my information about which you inquire, they were the newspapers, your magazine Equity, the Dies committee reports, hearings before committees, and debates in Congress and last, but by no means least, many appeals and statements from members of your organization.

Regarding your request for "satisfactory evidence," may I ask, satisfactory to whom? Obviously, the facts are sufficiently satisfactory to my colleagues in Congress and to myself to warrant continuing the ban against the Federal theater.

I do not have in my possession membership cards in the Communist Party of the seven people named. However, all of them have been or are now members of one or more "Communist Front" organizations. Some of them have been signatories to public statements lauding or defending the Soviet system, the U. S. S. R., or preaching "party line" propaganda. I enclose herewith a very few samples of evidence with which you no doubt are familiar, as I believe they were all issued from New York:

1. Louis Schaffer's "Stalin's 'Fifth Column' on Broadway."

2. A photostatic copy of page 2 of the Daily Worker of August 14, 1939, showing the names of some of the signatories to the now famous letter of August 10, 1939, dubbed by The Nation a "complete endorsement of the Soviet system."

3. A photostatic copy of the statement by American Progressives on the Moscow Trials, volume 1, page 375, of the Dies committee hearings, signed by Philip Loeb.

In conclusion I wish to advise you that a copy of this communication will be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I shall be pleased to insert also your reply.

In order that the rank and file of your membership may be familiar with this situation, I request that this communication and my letter to Mr. Dullzell about your resolution, together with my statements on the subject in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS of July 4 and July 11, be printed in your magazine Equity at an early date.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

JULY 22, 1940.

PAUL DULLZELL,
Executive Secretary, Actors' Equity Association, 45 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City:

Forwarded response to your letter together with letter to council. Please advise collect whether received.

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 23, 1940.

Representative WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON: We have received both your letters dated July 20 as well as excerpts from CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, also photostats, all of which will be presented to the council at its meeting today.

PAUL DULLZELL,
Executive Secretary, Actors' Equity Association.

ACTORS' EQUITY ASSOCIATION,
New York, July 25, 1940.

Representative WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: Both your letters dated July 20, along with the portions of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD dated July 4 and and 11, as well as the photostatic copies, including Mr. Schaffer's booklet, were brought to the attention of the council at its meeting on Tuesday.

Before we go any further, we would like to quote from the second paragraph of your letter addressed to us as follows: "In order that the council may be more fully informed, I request that my letter of July 11, confirming my telegraphic request for names and questioning the use of the words 'dominated or controlled' in the resolution be read to the council." We have to inform you that we never received such a letter. The only communication that we had from you prior to those we have referred to above, was a telegram acknowledging our letter and requesting the names of the members of the council who voted for and those who voted against the resolution referred to. We therefore would appreciate your sending us a copy of your letter dated July 11.

The council also considered your telegraphic request for the names of the council members voting for and voting against the resolution and we were directed to inform you that inasmuch as the discussions before the council and the voting thereon has by long-established precedent been secret, and inasmuch further as these discussions made it evident that the vote was determined by matters not pertinent to the issue involved, and because further if the Dies committee will go into this whole matter quickly and thoroughly, all facts in which you are interested will be brought to light, the council feels that the names of the voters one way or the other should not be presently revealed.

However, in any investigation to be made by any governmental agency, we will be glad to open our records of those voting.

We think you should also know that as a result of this situation and its developments, that the council adopted a resolution, the sense of which is that Equity will request and demand an investigation of the whole matter by the Dies committee or any other governmental agency, and we ask for your cooperation to this end. We have already communicated with Mr. DIES.

Regarding compliance with the request made in the last paragraph of your letter, which we quote:

"In order that the rank and file of your membership may be familiar with this situation, I request that this communication and my letter to Mr. Dullzell about your resolution, together with my statements on the subject in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS of July 4 and July 11, be printed in your magazine Equity at an early date."

The council has agreed that this request be complied with. As this activity requested by you and carried out by us is clearly outside legislative protection, publication in accordance with our established practice is contingent upon a favorable opinion from our legal department that neither you nor we are laying ourselves open to a claim of libel by any of the parties affected. Your early advices on this point will be appreciated.

This printed record will also contain the individual statements of members affected regarding their relation to communism or communistic activities.

Very truly yours,

ACTORS' EQUITY ASSOCIATION,
PAUL DULLZELL,
Executive Secretary.

JULY 26, 1940.

Mr. PAUL DULLZELL,
Executive Secretary, Actors' Equity Association, 45 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City.

DEAR MR. DULLZELL: Your letter of July 25 has been received, and I am pleased to enclose a copy of my previous letter of the 11th, which evidently never reached your desk.

I am disappointed that you have not seen fit to furnish me with the names of the proponents and opponents of the council's strange resolution of July 9, as this might lead some people to believe that the voters were afraid of something. The reason I wanted the names was that it occurred to me some of these people having communistic leanings may have been the very people who voted for the resolution. I was anxious to know whether I had been of assistance to the council in bringing this situation out in the clear, but apparently the reaction was one of opposition to my efforts. Perhaps some of the very people I have accused were influential in getting this resolution passed. I know that you have nothing to hide, but others might not look at it this way. Another possible use of the names might be in aiding the Dies committee to come to a decision as to whether or not a prompt investigation of my charges should be made.

With respect to the propriety of reprinting in Equity my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, there may be some question as to whether such quotations would be immune from possible libel proceedings, so I would agree that you put the matter up to your legal department. As promised in my letter of July 20, this and other correspondence will be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I request that these data be included with the remarks of July 4 and 11 for printing in Equity. I shall forward a copy as soon as printed.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

AUGUST 1, 1940.

Mr. PAUL DULLZELL,
Executive Secretary, Actors' Equity Association,
New York City:

Has my letter of July 26 been received? If so when may answer be expected? Need for CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

AUGUST 2, 1940.

Mr. PAUL DULLZELL,
Executive Secretary, Actors' Equity Association,
New York City.

DEAR MR. DULLZELL: I have been looking for a reply to my special-delivery letter of the 26th ultimo; and when none was received, wired you yesterday, as follows:

"Has my letter of July 26 been received? If so, when may answer be expected? Need for CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

I was very much pleased with the democratic action of the council in voting to accede to my wish to print the material I requested in Equity magazine, and trust that your lawyers have by this time allayed any fears as to libel. If that is not the case, I would call attention to the privilege you have of having these various statements printed at cost by the Government Printing Office. Franked envelopes would be furnished, permitting the mailing to your membership at no cost for postage.

Miss Maida Reade has written me in connection with this matter, and since she is an official of your association, I would appreciate my letter to her of today being read at your next council meeting.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

Mr. Speaker, I have no reply to my telegram of the 1st or my letter of the 2d.

As I go over this correspondence with Equity, I cannot escape the conclusion that its executive officers are in fact restrained from opening up and laying all the cards on the table. Over 2 months have passed since the W. P. A. theater project was killed the second time, and all I hear from several of the responsible officials of Equity are comments which can only be construed as hostile, both to Congress in deciding not to permit Federal aid to a communistic-controlled profession and to my own feeble efforts to spread some light upon a sordid situation. However, I must exempt from this conclusion several of Equity's officials who have phoned and written me that I am absolutely right.

Actors and actresses in economic distress are as entitled to Federal relief and Federal encouragement as is any other group hit by the depression. The Government has been lavish in its efforts to keep the wolf away from the door of the humble home and the "white collar" apartment, and it has done a fairly good job. Then why should this ban be continued against one of the finest and most patriotic groups of American citizens? The only answer to this question is the fact that the entertainment profession, deeper in the throes of the depression than any other profession, has been seized upon by the "reds," and the decent members must suffer. Even when the W. P. A. theater project was first killed, only good American artists were fired by Hallie Flanagan. By some unseen, hidden power Mrs. Flanagan transferred all of her Communists over to the National Youth project. They did not lose a day. And are they laughing at Congress!

Honest and patriotic actors are caught in the trough and made to suffer. With only a half dozen plays now on Broadway, and a continued decline in opportunities even in the busy season, due to the encroachment of the movies and the radio, the plight of these professional people is indeed bad. And it is always when unemployment persists that the subversive elements get in their best licks. Despondent and without nearby hopes, decent members of organized groups become the prey of the Communists who have invariably wormed their way into the inner councils. Important policies are determined by small groups comprised of the very elements who are in actual minority, but who are able to put their ideas across due to the disheartened attitude of respectable and patriotic members. Any attempt to bring out the true facts results in cries of "red baiting."

An eloquent plea in behalf of unemployed actors and actresses was made before the Committee on Appropriations considering the new W. P. A. bill by Miss Maida Reade, chairman of Equity's Unemployment Committee, and I wish to call attention to the following correspondence with Miss Reade; also to a telegram signed by Miss Reade and others. She opens up a possibility which I feel should be prosecuted further:

NEW YORK, July 12, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: As chairman of the various committees which shuttled to and from New York and Washington from early April to the middle of June seeking to get actors back into the relief bill, I am very anxious to know why you made your July 4 speech. You must have had some information or proof, and I assure you that as the present chairman of the unemployment committee in Equity I will, upon receipt of such information or proof, start an immediate movement to rid ourselves of such Communists on the grounds that they are undesirable members of Equity and have hindered the chances of their fellow members to get employment under the relief bill.

The impression I received from the member of my committee who called on you, Mr. Stephen Kent, was that you would favor the return of the theater to the relief bill if proper restrictions could be made to insure no repetition of the former abuses in the Federal Theater. Those restrictions were offered in our hearing before the Senate subcommittee and the Senate refused to put them in. We then urged the members of the House subcommittee to put in those restrictions or any others they wished.

It would seem, if you and the other members of the committee who said they would vote to put the theater back if properly restricted, had been sincere in their desire to help good American actors, you would have put in those restrictions and given us back the theater. My committee found Washington overrun with Workers Alliance members, the people whose tactics caused the discontinuance of the Federal theater before, and to the complete amazement of all of us, found them being received with the utmost cordiality by Congress. I can only say that the back slapping by Congress of people of the caliber of the Workers Alliance, while possibly expedient to vote getting, aroused a feeling of nausea in us at the spectacle. It seems to me it was a feeling of fear as to what the Workers Alliance might do to their Representatives at election time instead of the few potential "reds" there may be in Equity that caused us to be once more left out, and the exhibition is not inspiring.

Trusting that I may receive an early reply from you, I am,

Very sincerely,

MAIDA READE,
Chairman, Unemployment Committee, Actors' Equity Association.

AUGUST 2, 1940.

Miss MAIDA READE,
Chairman, Unemployment Committee, Actors' Equity Association, 45 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City.

DEAR MISS READE: This will refer to your letter of July 12 concerning the Communists on your council. I also note that you are one of the signers of a telegram of the same date protesting against our Government continuing its recognition of the Communist Party.

The enclosed copies of my remarks of July 4 and 11 in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will largely answer the points raised in your letter. However, you state:

"My committee found Washington overrun with Workers Alliance members, the people whose tactics caused the discontinuance of the Federal theater before, and to the complete amazement of all of us found them being received with the utmost cordiality by Congress. * * * It seems to me it was a feeling of fear as to what the Workers Alliance might do to their representatives at election time instead of the few potential 'reds' there may be in Equity that caused us to be once more left out, and the exhibition is not inspiring."

If there is still any such idea remaining in your mind after reading the enclosed statements, I wish to call your attention to one more. The following is from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 23, page 6754:

"The latter restriction would keep out mere amateurs and would also remove much cause of opposition on the score that a lot of young men and women, members of many radical organizations, had wormed their way into places of influence and power in the last theater project. * * * The reason why I included in my amendment the limitation that the actor or actress had to be a member of the theatrical profession prior to July 1, 1933, was to avoid bringing these so-called amateur thespians into the theater project and to prevent the so-called Workers Alliance from dominating the situation."

This statement was made by my colleague, Hon. Emanuel Celler, who offered an amendment, sponsored, I presume, by your committee. This amendment would have reinstated the theater project in the W. P. A. with certain restrictions.

However, Mr. Speaker, the amendment and the reinstatement of the Federal theater project were not acceptable to Congress since they could not believe your committee's assurance that the "red" influence would be eliminated. Congress had learned of the communistic infiltration into the Actors' Equity Association itself. If you will refer to page 18 of the report of the House Committee on Appropriations, Report No. 2186, on House Joint Resolution 544 you will find reference to the investigation made by a subcommittee of W. P. A. activities and the disclosure of such subversive activities. I cannot understand your statement that Congress feared the Workers Alliance since you must know, if you were in Washington while the above resolution was being considered, that Congress granted none of the Workers Alliance demands.

Now with respect to the Communist Party and the viewpoints brought out in your telegram—it is my firm conviction that any political organization which is subject to foreign influence such as the Nazi Bund or the Communist Party should be outlawed, and we made one halting step in that direction in House Joint Resolution 544 by depriving such travelers of W. P. A. benefits. I would further say that any citizen of the United States knowingly joining and insisting on membership in such organizations should be charged with treason. I am in complete agreement with your suggestion that Congress should outlaw the Communist Party and assure you I shall be glad to do all in my power to help accomplish this.

Some of the council members I have named may be innocents, but their tours up and down and always along the party line make it difficult to consider them as merely soft-minded liberals. The council should certainly know the extent to which they have been colonized by Communists, conscious fellow-travelers, and innocent Communist "stooges." The council knows (or is guilty of a most grevious neglect of duty not merely to its organization but to the Nation) the members who have Muscovite predilections, whose actions frequently parallel the party line. They deny it, of course, in the way familiar with their kind. However, that hardly relieves the council of its obvious duty.

I do not know the extent to which the cosigners of your telegram are familiar with my statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and my correspondence with Mr. Dullzell, but as I have been advised by Mr. Dullzell that the magazine Equity will reprint all of this material, I need not review it here.

I would appreciate it if you would show this letter to the others signing the telegram and also read it to the next council meeting, as I note from your letterhead that you are a member.

Thanking you for your cooperation, I am,

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 12, 1940.

Congressman WILLIAM LAMBERTSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

If we have Communists in our membership, which you say we have, the undersigned Equity members suggest that you, as a Member of Congress, insist that Congress outlaw the Communist Party and facilitate the housecleaning you advise. We have no more use for Communists than you have, but how can any American organization expel them when the American Government recognizes them as a legal political party?

Winifred Lenihan, Alfred Kappeler, Lee Baker, Kathryn Givney, William David, Hugh Cameron, Beverly Bayne, Richard Whorf, Matt Briggs, and Maida Reade.

Numerous protests have been received in behalf of Alan Hewitt, another member of the council, named by me as one of the seven Communists on the council. I have no desire to harm any man and if Hewitt is in fact innocent I shall take the first opportunity to do my best to clear him. I have received letters and telegrams stating that he has never been a Communist from Stanley H. Silverman, New York City; William H. Scherman, Schwab and Beatty, New York City; Frederic March, West Los Angeles, Calif.; S. N. Behrman and Robert E. Sherwood, New York City.

I have also received a telegram along the same line from some 25 people, dated Princeton, N. J., July 9, which I ask to be inserted following these remarks, together with my reply, which, to date, has not been answered.

PRINCETON, N. J., July 9, 1940.

Representative LAMBERTSON,
House Office Building:

We, the undersigned members of the theatrical profession, protest the accusation you have made that Alan Hewitt, of the Equity Council, is a Communist. Knowing him to be a loyal American citizen, having no affiliation or even sympathy with the Communist Party, we deplore these completely unfounded charges.

Betty Garde, Theresa Helburn, Agnes Young, M. B. Loeb, Bill Rousseau, Frank Somers, Courtenay Savage, Harry Ellerbe, Frederic Tozere, Edith King, Bram Nossen, Ethel Wilson, Zachary Scott, Charles Newman, Jr., Bois Sokoloff, Charles Dingle, Mary Michael, Forrest Orr, Robert Griffith, Charles Holden, Virginia Holden, Perry Inins, Paul Ballantyne, Roger De Koven, Peter Beauvais, Kingsley Colton, Charles Stark.

JULY 17, 1940.

Miss THERESA HELBURN,
Care Theater Guild, 245 West Fifty-second Street, New York City.

DEAR MISS HELBURN: I received a telegram signed by yourself and many others at Princeton, N. J., in behalf of Mr. Alan Hewitt. The information which you send has been noted.

However, Hewitt has affiliated himself with Communist projects and as far as I know is still affiliated. I am sure you must understand what I am talking about in view of your connection with the beginning of the League Against War and Fascism. I believe you are no longer a supporter of that movement, and I am wondering whether you may not be again mistaken in thus sponsoring Mr. Hewitt.

I would appreciate it very much if you would pass this letter along to the others who signed the above-mentioned telegram as I do not have their individual addresses.

I am enclosing my additional remarks on this subject as of July 11.

Sincerely,

W. P. LAMBERTSON.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 5, 1940

RADIO ADDRESSES BY HON. FRANK KNOX, HON. ROBERT PORTER PATTERSON, AND GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a radio address delivered yesterday by the Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Frank Knox; also an address delivered yesterday over the radio by the Honorable Robert Porter Patterson, Assistant Secretary of War; and a radio address also delivered yesterday by Gen. John J. Pershing. These addresses pertain to the urgent necessity of our national defense. I feel that the most earnest judgment of all three of those very distinguished men are entitled to preservation in the RECORD for the careful consideration of the American people. The addresses are as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANK KNOX, THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY

Right now we are facing the most momentous choice in the history of the Republic.

A titanic revolutionary struggle for the domination of the entire world is being waged in Europe, Asia, and Africa. This attack is directed at democracy, competitive trade, and individual freedom everywhere. It is drawing closer and closer to the shores of the Western Hemisphere.

Facing this danger, with isolation from it impossible, is an unprepared United States.

Our one hope of keeping this vast struggle out of the Western Hemisphere rests on the success of our efforts to build our defenses on such a scale and with enough speed, so that no combination of international brigands would dare to test our power. That is the only international language which they understand or respect.

We must be prepared to defend all we have and all we are, or perish as a free people.

This is not a choice of our making. It has been forced upon us.

In 3 months we have seen the lamp of liberty go out in Scandinavia, Holland, Belgium, and France. These countries, like our own, faced the same choice, but they committed the fatal error of preparing too little and too late.

Britain is fighting desperately with her back to the wall, not knowing at what moment the Nazi blight will envelop her from the sea and from the air. If Britain falls and her vast sea power is broken or seized, the Atlantic Ocean will cease to be our great barrier of defense. The Atlantic will become a highway for attack upon us.

There are still those who deny that we face an emergency at all. They say that the wars of Europe will not engulf us—if we only mind our own business. They say that no dictator, however mad, would dare attack the United States or any other part of the Western Hemisphere. They contend that strict neutrality—and two oceans—are this country's true protection.

I wish this were true. But the tragic record proves the opposite. What the dictators want, they take. Every treaty they have signed, every pledge they have made, these power-crazed conquerors have thrown to the winds when it suited their purpose. When and if they complete the conquest of Europe and join hands with aggressors in Asia, they will desperately need the wealth of the Western Hemisphere. Their record in the past has proved that they would not hesitate to seize this wealth—if they can.

Hitler and Mussolini already have told us what they think of the Monroe Doctrine. The Nazi dictator has made it plain that he will waste little time or sympathy on American policies if these policies interfere with his dream of domination.

If treates of peace and pledges of security mean nothing to the Nazi-Fascist warlords, what may the United States expect when the Monroe Doctrine already is openly flouted?

It is plain enough that the European aggressors will not hesitate when the time comes for the plundering of the New World. With Europe and Asia under their domination, Hitler and Mussolini will have an overwhelmng part of the world's population as vassals. The gigantic industrial resources of these continents will be theirs. Only the raw materials of the New World will be lacking. It is inconceivable that the dictators will shy at seizing this last and most vital prize—the riches of North and South America.

Even if actual attack were long delayed, the United States would be caught in an economic squeeze play—facing the Nazi-Fascist combination on the Atlantic and an aggressive hungry power on the Pacific. If we did not adjust our policies to please these world masters, the squeeze play would begin. We would then exist by consent—the consent of ruthless tyrants.

That is the danger we face and Congress has been quick to realize it. The United States is now launched on the greatest rearmament program in history. We are prepared to spend $10,000,000,000 for ships and planes and tanks and all the other records of modern war. If we require greater proof that a national emergency exists, I do not know what it would be.

As the head of the Navy Department, it is my special duty to look after the expansion of our sea power—to build up our sea defenses. But our problem of defense today in the light of what has transpired in Europe is much greater than a Navy problem. It is clearly a matter of developing all our land, sea, and air forces if we are to meet new methods of attack. Time was when the oceans formed a great barrier; the airplane, the bombers, the parachutes, the submarines, have changed everything; once an enemy is based on this side of the Atlantic we are as vulnerable as if no acean existed between ourselves and our enemies.

True, our Navy must always be our first line of defense against a foreign aggressor. But until we get our 3,000,000-ton Navy, with an adequate air arm, land and air forces have a value and an importance that cannot be exaggerated. In this day and age we must use every arm of our strength, we must solidify our power, we must neglect nothing.

But building ships and planes and tanks is a vain and empty gesture without trained men to man them. Our greatest problem is manpower. If we are to achieve the greatest defensive armament the world has ever known, we must have the men as well as the machines and the ships. This is so plain, it says itself. But it presents the gravest question we have yet faced. We know from the experience of the last World War and from the tragic examples of the countries now conquered that it takes as long to train men as it does to build machines.

We know also from experience that there is only one fair and democratic way to secure manpower for adequate defense by land and sea and air. That is by selective universal military training. Any other method will produce nothing but confusion. And confusion is one of the weapons that Hitler and Mussolini have used with most deadly effects against the countries they have crushed. If we choose any other course than selective training we shall be taking that fatal risk.

What would be the use of a vast defensive machine operated by untrained and unskilled men? This would be nearly as dangerous as hurling brave but unarmed men against the juggernauts of modern war. Either course would invite destruction.

Still, in the face of grim realities, we hear many people say they do not believe in what they call "conscription in peacetime." They contend that military training is a step toward fascism. That it is against all American traditions. That it would make us a militaristic nation.

None of these contentions is sound. In the first place, selective universal training is the only democratic method of filling up and expanding our land and air and naval forces. Enlistment is not only insufficient, but in many ways dangerous. In the early part of the last war, we saw thousands of young men voluntarily leaving vital occupations to join the colors. This created industrial dislocation and provided only a fraction of the men needed.

Under a selective training system, the needed number of men would be called at the right time. This would prevent economic and industrial dislocation without violating a single basic American liberty. Liberty involves responsibility. The most important of these is the defense of liberty itself.

Now for the theory that compulsory training is against American traditions. It is true that we have never had such training in peacetime. But it is equally true that this country has never faced such a world as confronts it now. No one can honestly believe that these are days of peace.

In the past we have resorted to compulsory service whenever the Nation was threatened. Today we cannot wait until war is actually upon us. It would be too late.

Another opinion frequently heard is that the country has not sufficient equipment to train a large army; that our new ships will not be ready for years; that we should wait until the war machines and materials are ready before Congress even considers a compulsory-training measure. This is dangerous folly.

Because we propose to set up the lawful machinery of national defense does not mean that we propose to call a big army over night, or to enroll a huge navy or air personnel. But it does mean that, through registration, the Nation would have a reservoir of manpower to call upon at the right time and for the right service.

The basic problem lies in building our defenses, including our trained forces to such a size that we shall not be attacked. So big that possible enemies will be afraid to attack us.

We have a country that is worth defending. We possess a democratic way of life that is priceless, that we cherish beyond any other of our possessions. The responsibility for protecting these freedoms of ours is a common responsibility; all of us must do our part in keeping these liberties. It cannot be done by writing checks. It must be done by men who are trained and ready to use the weapons our checks provide.

The saddest words, born of the incredible travail of Europe, now under the heel of a ruthless conqueror are these: "Too little and too late."

We must heed this lesson if we are to be safe. Far better "too much and too soon," than that we too should be "too little and too late."

As one of those charged with a great responsibility in this grave moment, I say to you, my fellow Americans, with all of the sincerity and passionate earnestness I can command, it is later than you think.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT PORTER PATTERSON, THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR

Ladies and gentlemen, today America needs an Army of about 1,300,000 men. That sounds like a great many soldiers. In fact, it is but 1 for every 100 of us. We need this force, not to wage aggressive war anywhere, not to send expeditionary forces to Europe, or to Asia, but simply to defend this continent against aggression. Let us see why.

In the first place, we are committed by the Monroe Doctrine to maintain the integrity of the Western Hemisphere. Such a policy implies not only the defense of continental America, from Point Barrow to Tierra del Fuego, but also the denial to an enemy of air bases on any one of the numerous islands within flying radius of the mainland. Above all, it means the maintenance of a Panama Canal continuously open for the transit of the United States fleet.

For the successful accomplishment of these strategic missions, the War Department believes that we must have as a minimum a powerful, mobile army, thoroughly trained and properly equipped, consisting of 27 infantry divisions, two cavalry divisions, and four armored divisions, with the necessary supporting corps, army, and general headquarters units. Based on our own previous peacetime standards, such an army is, indeed, a formidable array but, compared to what other powers have at present, it is relatively a modest figure. Germany, for instance, has between 200 and 250 divisions. Great Britain has crowded into the United Kingdom alone, an area comparable to that of New England, a total of at least 33 divisions. With a similar number of mobile units we hope to protect an entire continent.

In total strength this ground army calls for 850,000 men. To be sure, such a peacetime force would set a new precedent for America, but, in comparison, Germany has five to six million soldiers, while Great Britain has marshaled about one and one-quarter million to resist the Nazi threat.

Since war has entered the third dimension we must keep pace with air progress. War Department plans call for 150,000 men to operate and maintain the necessary Air Corps equipment. Comparison with Germany and Great Britain again illustrates the reasonableness of the Army's plans. The Third Reich boasts of a well-rounded air force of about one-half million men. The Royal Air Force has about 250,000.

To these 850,000 ground and 150,000 air troops we must add 100,000 for our overseas garrisons. These outposts in the Philippine and Hawaiian Islands, in Alaska, in Puerto Rico, and in the Panama Canal Zone provide security for naval and air bases from which our forces can operate to deny hostile access to our shores.

For fixed harbor defenses so necessary for the protection of seaports and naval bases in continental United States, the War Department estimates a need for another 50,000 men. Nor does this number appear excessive when we consider the length of our coast line and the vital importance of our many large cities exposed to attack from the sea.

In addition, 150,000 to 200,000 men will be required for the induction and the initial training of recruits; for their supply, equipment, and medical care; and for other administrative functions connected with the establishment and maintenance of the augmented military forces.

The total in required military manpower thus runs to about 1,300,000. All past and present experiences of the War Department, both in peace and in war, indicate that such a number cannot be recruited on a voluntary basis. The only certain way of getting these men is to adopt a system of compulsory military training.

Since coming to Washington, I have heard the proposition advanced that the reason voluntary enlistments do not produce the necessary numbers is because the term of service, 3 years, is too long; and that a short term of 1 year would bring the desired results.

The War Department does not believe that a system of 1-year voluntary enlistments would serve the purpose. Under such a method of recruiting, it would be impossible to provide orderly organization and training of military units on a time schedule. The number of enlistments would fluctuate from season to season, month to month, week to week, and even day to day. There would be a continuous flow of enlistments and discharges that would make impossible the semblance of smooth, efficient teamwork. It would necessitate a recruiting drive which might serve to win away from the bench and the lathe patriotic skilled workers who could serve best by staying on the job. Such an exodus from the factories might upset our whole program of industrial mobilization.

Voluntary enlistments are haphazard and catch men here and there by emotional appeals. The administration of universal service is orderly. It places men where they can be of most service to their country. It imposes no onus upon those not selected for duty with the armed forces.

The principal objection to voluntary enlistment, however, is that it is undemocratic. In return for equal rights and equal privileges, a democracy demands of its citizens equal duties and equal sacrifices. The obligation to defend America falls with impartial justice upon every citizen.

Voluntary enlistment places the burden upon the patriotic few. Compulsory military training extends it to all. It is the democratic way.

RADIO ADDRESS BY GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING

I am speaking tonight because I consider it my duty. It is my duty to tell you that, in my opinion, we face problems of the utmost seriousness, that all the things we hold most dear are gravely threatened. I must tell you that we can defend them only if we make up our minds now to speak the truth without concealment; if we make up our minds to face the truth without flinching; if we make up our minds to act upon the truth without hesitating. I think you will believe me when I say that no war was ever prevented by hiding the danger and by arguing that the danger does not exist.

The men who are best qualified to know what is going on in Europe and in Asia and in this hemisphere, the men whose business it is to know the facts, are very nearly unanimous in believing what I am saying to you tonight—that grave danger for us lurks in the present world situation. So the time has come when we must rise up as a united people to make secure our country's independence and our great inheritance of constitutional liberty.

More than half the world is ruled by men who despise the American idea and have sworn to destroy it. They know that while one great people remains independent and free because it is strong and is brave they can never crush finally the people they have conquered. The example of liberty here will always continue to inspire the resistance to tyranny over there. They are fanatical and they are strong. They are efficient and they are ruthless. Eight nations have tried to appease them. The appeasers of eight nations are dead or in jail or discredited and ruined. In seven of these eight nations the appeasers who would not take the danger seriously, who would not prepare when there was still time, have led their countries to disaster.

It is not hysterical to insist that democracy and liberty are threatened. With democracy and liberty overthrown on the continent of Europe only the British are left to defend democracy and liberty in Europe.

By sending help to the British we can still hope with confidence to keep the war on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean, where the enemies of liberty, if possible, should be defeated. But some are bold about what they would do tomorrow, if Great Britain is defeated, and the war comes to this hemisphere. I say to you solemnly that tomorrow may be forever too late to keep war from the Americas. Today may be the last time when by measures short of war we can still prevent war.

We must be ready to meet force with a stronger force. We must make ourselves strong by building up our Army and Navy and the establishment of the principle of universal selected service, which means merely that the men needed are chosen by lot.

And I am telling you tonight, because it is my duty to warn you before it is too late, that the British Navy needs destroyers and small craft to convoy merchant ships, to escort its warships, to hunt submarines, and to repel invasion. We have an immense reserve of destroyers left over from the other war, and in a few months the British will be completing a large number of destroyers of their own. The most critical time, therefore, is the next few weeks and months. If there is anything we can do to help save the British Fleet during that time, we shall be failing in our duty to America if we do not do it.

If a proper method can be found, America will safeguard her freedom and security by making available to the British or Canadian Governments at least 50 of the overage destroyers which are left from the days of the World War. If the destroyers help save the British Fleet, they may save us from the danger and hardship of another war. Americans should not shrink from duty because of possible hazards.

I know that many sincere patriots are frightened at the thought of even the smallest act because they think such acts would lead us closer to the day when another American Expeditionary Force sets sail for Europe. It is my opinion that in this war it would be absolute folly even to consider sending another expeditionary force. No one is considering it, and those who may say that anyone is considering it are deceiving themselves and deceiving you.

We must have the strength of character to face the truth. Foremost among the truths which we will ignore at our peril is that the time needed to build our own defenses may be lengthened if we have the courage to make the small but important contribution which is still within our power toward the sustaining of the British defense.

A new kind of war is loose in the world—fought with all weapons, including treason, and fought most insidiously during what some of our countrymen call "peacetime." It is a war against the civilization that we know. It is a revolution against all the values which we have cherished and which we wish our children to cherish in the future. It is a revolution which denies the dignity of man and which banishes the hope of brotherhood and comradeship on earth. We can see it developing right before our very eyes.

It must be faced with daring and with devotion. We must lift up our hearts. We must reaffirm our noble tradition. We must make ourselves so strong that the tradition we live by shall not perish from the earth.

Answer to Colonel Lindbergh

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, last evening the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] delivered a very able address over the Mutual Broadcasting System in reply to Colonel Lindbergh's speech delivered on last Sunday. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

During the last 4 years when war in Europe seemed inevitable, Franklin D. Roosevelt did everything within his limited power to persuade the nations of Europe to adjust their difficulties through peaceful means rather than war. Even to the last hour before Italy entered the struggle the President pleaded with Mussolini to avoid the calamities of war through the arts of peace. He has sent emissaries to Europe to discuss the basis upon which peace with the world could be attempted. For these gestures of good will toward mankind he has been berated in his own country as an interventionist and a warmonger.

But now, when Old World hate and destruction have been fanned into roaring flames by war, we find Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, one of the world's best air pilots, advising the United States to offer Europe a peace plan to end the war. No details of the plan in the colonel's mind are offered. It is a generality of the widest latitude.

However, in this same address the colonel admonishes the Nation not to interfere in the affairs of a foreign nation. What a paradox. Colonel Lindbergh seems to think that offering a peace plan to the warring nations of the world would not be interfering with their internal affairs.

In all the advice given by this experienced flyer to the American people concerning our foreign policy there has been a continuous strain of criticism, indirectly at least, of the President of the United States. Again on yesterday Colonel Lindbergh ridiculed and brushed aside as war hysteria the President's statement made to the Congress of the United States that Greenland is only 4 hours by air from Newfoundland and 6 hours by air from New England. The colonel talked about Greenland's Arctic climate, mountainous terrain, and its ice-filled seas as though it were impossible for a plane to land there; yet, in 1933, Germany sent a crew of research men to Greenland who lived there for 6 months. I have talked with the photographer who was in that group. I have seen the pictures taken by him. Airplanes were in constant use during both the warm and cold weather. The leader of this expedition reported to Adolf Hitler, as a result of that survey, that whoever controlled Greenland in the future would control the economic and military policy between Europe and North America. We wonder sometimes about hysterical chatter.

There can be no question that Colonel Lindbergh, along with many others in this country, has attempted to pin, either directly or indirectly, upon the shoulders of the President of the United States the ignominious label of war. But on yesterday the colonel said that we shall not enter the war in Europe. In other words, he has changed his mind since June 15 last. At this moment it is well to examine the record and let the people of the United States know the facts, undistorted by those in this country who do not like President Roosevelt. I quote these statements to demonstrate that our President is a man of peace and not of war.

In August 1936, at Chautauqua, N. Y., President Roosevelt said:

"I hate war. I have passed unnumbered hours—I shall pass unnumbered hours—thinking and planning how war may be kept from this Nation. I wish I could keep war from all nations, but that is beyond my power."

In October 1937, in the city of Chicago, the President said:

"War is a contagion whether it be declared or undeclared. * * * If civilization is to survive, the principles of the Prince of Peace must be restored. Shattered trust between nations must be revived."

He continued:

"America hates war. America hopes for peace. Therefore America actively engages in the search for peace."

Again, in 1939, when the President called the Congress into extraordinary session for the purpose of passing the present Neutrality Act, and at a time when Colonel Lindbergh and others were telling the American people that the repeal of the embargo was a step on the road to war, the President said:

"Let no man or group in any walk of life assume exclusive protectorate over the future well-being of America, because I conceive that, regardless of party or section, the mantle of peace and of patriotism is wide enough to cover us all. Let no group assume the exclusive label of the peace bloc. We all belong to it."

And then again, as late as July 10 of this year, in a message to the Congress, the President said:

"That we are opposed to war is known not only to every American but to every government in the world. We will not use our arms in a war of aggression; we will not send our men to take part in European wars."

It is indeed interesting to note in the Colonel's address the statement that this Nation is determined not to go to war. Obviously, I agree with that statement, except with respect to a war in defense of our soil and freedom. However, I am of the opinion that this determination to avoid involvement in the European conflict is not a recent decision but a firm purpose nurtured in the heart of every American for many years.

Yes, my friends; we all belong to the peace bloc in America; but every true and sincere patriot will battle to the last to see that the ideals of democracy continue in this Nation, even though we might ultimately be surrounded by totalitarian powers on the east and the west. I confess that I was not only amazed but somewhat shocked by Colonel Lindbergh's attitude of complacency toward Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Government. Obviously, that is his American privilege, just as it is my privilege to express a sincere hope that England, the last democracy in Europe, is saved from brutal autocracy. It is freedom of expression, freedom of thought, and freedom of action which we enjoy in America that are always denied by the totalitarian governments once they conquer a country.

Colonel Lindbergh advises the American people that if Germany wins this war, cooperation will be possible. He further said that "cooperation is never impossible where there is sufficient gain on both sides, and that treaties are seldom torn apart when they do not cover a weak nation."

In other words, my friends, treaties with little, weak, and helpless nations mean nothing. And how true that is in the light of recent events. Even Colonel Lindbergh could not have forgotten the ruthless invasion by Adolf Hitler of Holland, a nation that had not drawn her sword for 147 years. No one has forgotten the rape of Denmark and Norway, or the complete annihilation of Poland in 14 days by the mechanized forces of Nazi Germany. None of us has forgotten the violation of the treaties with Austria, Czechoslovakia, and heroic Belgium. No one has forgotten the fall of democratic France; and yet in that address of yesterday Colonel Lindbergh advises us to be cautious about criticizing the present French Government under Marshal Petain, which, as everyone knows, is a Nazi Government. Yes; these are the peaceful, defenseless nations that have been trampled under the iron heel of the dictator, with some 200,000,000 people in complete subjugation and tyranny.

What does Adolf Hitler say about the United States of America? Let no one believe that he has neglected our continent in his plans, notwithstanding the inference of Colonel Lindbergh to the contrary. Hitler said:

"We shall soon have storm troopers in America. We shall train our youth. And we shall have men whom degenerate Yankeedom will not be able to challenge. Into the hands of our youth will be given the great statesmanlike mission of Washington which this corrupt democracy has trodden underfoot."

Yes; we find him advising the world that he will restore the work of General Washington and carry on from that point. But Colonel Lindbergh scoffs at the protection the English Navy has given us. He ridicules the idea of an invasion. I hope he is right, but I solemnly remind the American people that the apparent impossible in the last few months in Europe has become accomplished fact.

Colonel Lindbergh said, among other things:

"I would be among the last to advocate depending upon treaties for our national safety. I believe that we should rearm fully for the defense of America."

Why, if, as Colonel Lindbergh says, our troubles can be solved through the treaty-making power, does he advocate in his address of yesterday that America rearm fully for her defense? Why is it that all Democrats and Republicans in both branches of Congress have supported the appropriation of billions upon billions for a sound and adequate national defense? Why is it that the people of this country are interested in a two-ocean navy if peace throughout the world can be maintained by treaty?

Whom do we fear? Is it England? Are we making all of these preparations for fear of the mother country, with her back to the wall, fighting the last great fight for democracy on the other side of the ocean? Do we believe that England somehow will turn and train her guns and men and her ships toward America's shores and invade us? Do we fear Canada with whom we have lived in peace for over a hundred years? If this is the case, why did we not become excited a year ago and appropriate billions for defense when England was at her peak with her Army and her Navy?

No; this rearming for national defense as advocated by Lindbergh and the people of this country is being done for just one purpose, and that is to keep the totalitarian germs of Europe and Asia away from the shores of America. Your people and my people have been migrating to this land of freedom and opportunity for the last 300 years. They left their homes in Europe to escape tyranny, oppression, intolerance, and persecution. It is our job, with unanimity of thought and action, to keep autocracy in the place of its birth.

If American people are looking for guidance and counsel in this hour of American uncertainty, I say, with all due deference to Colonel Lindbergh, that you should stop, look, and listen before you follow this youthful man who has blossomed overnight into an oracle who instructs the world and his country on such momentous problems as war, statesmanship, and diplomacy. Yesterday he admitted that he is no expert on these issues of world-wide significance, but then proceeded to condemn this era of experts, and finally concluded his speech by advising the American people that he has faith in the American Army, the American Navy, and the American air force. And yet these military leaders are the real experts upon whom this Nation must depend for our future guidance in national defense.

My friends, I still contend that Col. Charles A. Lindbergh is a great American flier.

Draft of Capital in Time of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, today's issue of the Washington News carries on the front page a headline, "Draft idle capital, says Mrs. F. D." Then, in her column on page 18, under the heading "My Day," appears an article endorsing the conscription of capital if men are to be conscripted. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MY DAY—I AM GLAD TO AGREE WITH THE GENERAL

(By Eleanor Roosevelt)

HYDE PARK, Monday.—I am very glad to find myself in agreement with Gen. Hugh Johnson, whom I like personally very much, though I do not frequently have an opportunity to agree with his ideas. He has been writing in favor of the selective draft and in his column on Saturday says something which I believe is true:

"It is simply a question of whether or not we are going to get adequate defense against overseas attack and get it quick enough to keep war away from these shores. We won't get it if we don't get selective service and get it promptly."

With this I agree, but I should like to add something more which I believe every Senator and Congressman, as well as every public servant in the country, no matter whether he is Republican or Democrat, should be watching with the greatest care. We know that in the past some people have profited financially from war. It is one thing to draft young men to give their services to their country and another to draft such capital as may be lying idle for investment in ways which may be deemed necessary for defense and which may mean little or no return to the investor.

The obvious answer is that most capital is in the nature of a trusteeship. Those who have it to invest feel a responsibility to the people (you and me whom they represent in banks and companies) for the way in which they invest it. It is apparent that some people cannot afford to spare anything from small incomes. But the best minds in the country should be occupied at the present time with determining how it can be made equally certain that capital, wherever possible, is drafted for the use of the country in just the way that lives are drafted.

I am no economist. I am not a public servant. I am a mother and a citizen in a democracy, however, and I think it should be clearly put before us exactly how this is being done today. In Congress and in administrative circles this is a responsibility which the people are going to want to be sure is being considered and adequately safeguarded.

Preserving Our American Heritage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY FRED BRENCKMAN

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD the radio address made by Mr. Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange, on the subject, Preserving Our American Heritage.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESERVING OUR AMERICAN HERITAGE

Everything that has transpired since the outbreak of the present European war has had a sobering effect on the people of the United States. We have witnessed with feelings of deep concern the triumphant progress of the totalitarian powers and the overthrow of popular institutions of government.

Today England, the last great democracy of Europe, is confronted with the most desperate emergency in her long history, and in the heroic battle she is waging in defense of her national life she has the prayers and the good will of liberty-loving people of the United States and of the whole world.

People are conscious of the fact that this is no ordinary war, but that it constitutes nothing less than a revolution against democracy itself, and that the final triumph of Hitlerism would lower the stature of the average man and woman and blot out most of the progress that has been made by the free nations of the world during many weary centuries.

Under these circumstances, it behooves the people of the United States to look to their own foundations and to take effective steps for the preservation of the ideals and institutions that are dear to every American heart.

OUR RICH INHERITANCE

No people in all history ever possessed a heritage comparable to that which is ours. The United States was generously endowed by nature, which gave us a healthful climate, a fertile soil, abundant mineral resources, and the finest forests in the world. But the fact remains that the preeminence of the United States in the family of nations must be largely attributed to the freedom and security we have enjoyed for more than 150 years, under the form of government established by the forefathers of this country.

Every American worthy of the name should be eager and willing to do his part to preserve, protect, and defend our national heritage and to pass it on unimpaired to our posterity.

We know that the leaders of the totalitarian nations consider the people unfit for self-government. While Mussolini rode into power as a stalwart advocate of popular rights, as soon as he found himself firmly entrenched, he brutally declared that liberty was a rotten corpse. For years Hitler has echoed and personified the same sentiment. What has happened in Russia since the people threw off the yoke of the czars, only to submit to the outrages and brutalities that have characterized the rule of their successors, forms one of the darkest pages of human history.

While no form of government is perfect, it cannot be denied that democratic institutions are far superior to any others, providing the people have the virtue, the intelligence, and the capacity to make them function.

PEOPLE MISLED BY DEMAGOGUES

In looking for the reasons that led to the comparatively easy conquest of France on the part of Hitler and and his mechanized legions, it would not do to ignore the fact that the French people abused their liberties and that to a large extent they were duped and misled by demagogic politicians.

There was a world of meaning in the words used by the venerable Marshall Petain when, in summing up the causes that led to national disaster, he said:

"The people demanded more than they were willing to give."

There is a lesson and a warning in those words that should be heeded by the people of the United States. While many men of the highest character and patriotism adorn our public life, it is true, nevertheless, that we have our full share of mere politicians and demagogues.

If our American system of government is to be maintained and perpetuated, it is necessary that the rank and file of our citizenship should be able to distinguish between the political mountebank and the statesman. As a rule, the demagogue succeeds in getting himself elected to office by catering to the spirit of class; by advocating all sorts of impossible reforms, and by organizing raids on the Public Treasury. All too often the people overemphasize the privileges that go with citizenship, but overlook the duties and responsibilities that in every free country rest upon the citizen.

One of the first duties of every able-bodied citizen is to do his part toward supporting the Government; any attempt to reverse this process, asking the Government to support the citizen, cannot fail in the long run to end in disaster. This is a fundamental principle that we should all keep in mind. Any candidate for public office, posing as a friend of the people, and advocating policies that run counter to this fundamental doctrine must be regarded as a public enemy and should be defeated.

OUR UNWIELDY NATIONAL DEBT

In piling up a debt of monstrous proportions, most of it in a time of profound peace, the United States has already traveled far along the primrose path that leads to decay and destruction. Confronted as we are today with the absolute necessity of raising billions of dollars to make the Nation secure in a military sense, it will soon be borne in upon us that one of the most important elements in any scheme of national preparedness is financial preparedness.

George Washington gave us good advice in his farewell address, when he said: "Cherish public credit." As he also sagely observed, "The way to preserve it is to use it as sparingly as possible." Having ignored this admonition, we must now atone for it by economies and sacrifices that would otherwise not have been necessary.

Wisdom and prudence alike demand that we should shun going into debt unnecessarily any further and that we should strive to regain the road that leads to financial solvency.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF LEADERSHIP

It is common for legislators and others holding high position to excuse themselves for pursuing unsound policies on the ground that they are responding to the demands of their constituents. But it should be remembered that a real representative of the people is not their unreflecting mouthpiece nor their truckling servant, altering his course to meet each shifting breeze of opinion or puff of passion. He should be the spokesman for their conscience and their better nature as his own deepest and sincerest convictions reveal them to him. Edmund Burke, one of the best friends of the Colonies in the English Parliament at the time of the American Revolution, speaking to the electors of Bristol, happily expressed the duty of a genuine representative to his constituency. He said:

"It ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinions high respect; their business unremitted attention. But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure, nor from the law and the Constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion."

While it is true that under our form of government Members of Congress are supposed, broadly speaking, to reflect the will of their constituents, those who measure up to their responsibilities and opportunities should also seek to guide and direct public opinion along safe and sound channels.

OVERCENTRALIZATION OF GOVERNMENT

The tendency toward overcentralization of government that has been in progress in this country for many years is one that should be checked in the interest of democracy.

While it may have stirred the civic pride of a certain proportion of the people who live in the Nation's Capital to learn that Washington had registered a greater percentage of gain in population than any other large city in the country during the past 10 years; this is not a healthy sign. According to the Census Bureau, the population of Washington during the past decade jumped from 486,000 to 663,000, representing a gain of 36 percent. If all the Government workers who are domiciled in nearby Virginia and Maryland had been included, the gain would have been much greater.

The larger Washington grows, so much the worse for the rest of the country. Let us not forget that there is only one way in which the powers of Federal Government can be expanded, and that is by contracting or restricting in a corresponding degree the rights of the States and of individuals.

This Nation, with its wide domain, its diversified interests, and its huge population, is too great to be either wisely or democratically governed, down to the most minute details affecting the lives of the people, from the seat of the Federal Government in Washington.

I have always believed that we will get the best results if every unit of government—National, State, and local—stays within its proper sphere, each faithfully and efficiently discharging the duties which devolve upon it, and with none encroaching on the rights and prerogatives of the rest.

Speaking of our American heritage, which should be guarded and prized by every man, woman, and child within our borders, let me recall to your minds one of the inspired utterances of George Mason:

"No free government, or the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people but by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue, and by a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles."

Improvement in Economic Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, the definite upswing in business conditions has been most gratifying; and I have, in several instances, put in recent Appendixes of the RECORD articles showing economic conditions. This stimulus to business in this season of the year is most unusual, as midsummer is generally a period of no profits.

An article appearing in the Washington Star covering the report of the National City Bank of New York giving the half-year profits shows a most substantial economic improvement. The report definitely states that the companies showing a great percentage of improvement are not companies producing war materials, but are companies covering different major industries. Certainly no one will claim that this source is prejudiced in favor of the administration, but it should be taken as a source of unbiased opinion simply reporting conditions as they exist.

The Star story reporting on the National City Bank of New York letter is written by the financial writer of the Associated Press. It is in part as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of August 5, 1940]

UPSWING IN PROFITS INDICATES BIG TAX YIELD FOR TREASURY—FEDERAL BUSINESS LEVIES MAY RETURN RICHEST SUM SINCE 1918 AND 1919

(By Frederick Gardner, Associated Press financial writer)

NEW YORK, August 5.—Corporate reports for the first half of 1940 have shown a sharp upswing in profits, indicating revised Federal levies on business earnings may yield the Treasury the richest harvest since 1918 and 1919.

Four hundred leading industrial concerns for the first 6 months reported combined net profit of $648,928,000, compared with $409,123,000 in the initial half of 1939, a gain of 58 percent, according to a tabulation by the National City Bank of New York.

It is only fair to state that I believe that the Roosevelt administration policies have been responsible for this great economic progress and the return of stable prosperity.

Quoting from the August letter of the National City Bank, of New York, I take several paragraphs relating to the half-year's profits and a tabulation of profits of the leading corporations. I ask that they be incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE HALF YEAR'S PROFITS

Reports issued during the past month by leading corporations show a sharp increase in earnings in most lines of business during the first half year over the earnings of a year ago, accompanying the increase in general business activity. A tabulation of the published statements of 400 industrial corporations gives combined net profits, after taxes and less deficits, of approximately $649,000,000 in the first half of 1940, which compares with $409,000,000 for the same companies in the corresponding period of 1939 and represents a gain of 59 percent. These companies had an aggregate capital and surplus of $11,896,000,000 at the beginning of this year, upon which the 6 months' profits were at an annual rate of 10.9 percent, against a rate of 7 percent upon a slightly smaller net worth a year ago.

* * * * * * *

An examination of the comparative profits for the first half year shows the sharpest gains to have been made in the industries which last year were still relatively depressed.

I call especial attention to this paragraph:

It is noteworthy also that the gains are not confined to the companies producing war materials for the British Government or for our own expanding national-defense program, but instead are widely distributed among the different major industries.

An outstanding gain was registered by the steel companies, whose high rate of operations permitted a lowering of unit costs and a widening of profit margins, despite the temporary reduction in price on certain products. Manufacturers of machinery, tools, and various types of equipment have continued to operate at a high rate, and in some cases have made a larger profit in the first 6 months of 1940 than in the entire year 1939. The automobile industry set a high record in production during the first half year, while auto equipment and accessory plants have been busy on orders from the aircraft industry also. Chemical companies have had heavy demand for their products from the steel and other active industries, but in some instances the increased defense taxes have cut into the margins of net profit.

Profits of leading corporations for the half year—net profits are as reported, after depreciation, interest, taxes, and other charges and reserves, but before dividends—net worth includes book value of outstanding preferred and common stock and surplus account at beginning of each year

[In thousands of dollars]

Relations With Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, on yesterday I had permission of this body to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an extremely informative editorial pertaining to the situation in the Orient which I think really should be commended to the attention of every Member of Congress. The editorial was from the New York Daily News and was republished in the columns of the Washington Times-Herald. I ask that that be followed by publication in the Appendix of today's RECORD of another extremely interesting and informative article which was published in the columns of the Washington Times-Herald of August 5 under the heading "We have no excuse for war with Japan."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE NEWS—WE HAVE NO EXCUSE FOR WAR WITH JAPAN?

There can be no longer doubt that the United States Government is contemplating the projection of this Nation into war, not only with Germany and Italy but with Japan, and possibly, although unwillingly, with Russia as well.

Russia seems to be in friendly and profitable alliance with other totalitarian powers and to be participating in the fighting whenever it can advantageously add territory.

It has added territory amazingly up to date.

It has acquired part of Finland and probably will soon acquire all of that unhappy country.

It has possessed itself of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

It has taken over half of Poland and the Bessarabia section of Rumania.

In fact, it has gained more by the war than any other nation, because it has permanently acquired its occupied territories while Germany has only temporarily occupied a large part of her conquered terrain.

Japan, having made its peace with Russia and having been affronted by England, has definitely decided to oppose England's interests and to renew its association with Germany and Italy.

So it would be easy for the United States to precipitate hostilities with all four of these nations if it insists upon doing so.

In very fact, it would be difficult to engage one of them in conflict at the present time without involving the others in the conflict before it is ended.

Consequently, the lack of vision shown in the report of the United States naval high command to President Roosevelt becomes appallingly apparent.

There is every likelihood that Japan would, if attacked, have the same sort of assistance from powers friendly to it that Germany has had from Italy and Russia.

But even without that support the conception of the conquest of Japan in 3 weeks is so visionary as to spread alarm through the Nation.

If there is such a dull and distorted idea of the situation among our naval commanders before the war which Mr. Roosevelt is considering, how dull and how distorted might be the conduct of the war.

No naval war with a navy four-fifths the strength of ours and conducted at a distance of 4,000 miles from our base, and in close contact with its own fortified bases, can be concluded in 3 weeks.

Even the Cuban War, where the American Navy was twice the strength of Spain's and where the theater of operations was mainly at our door, was not concluded for a year.

And even then the United States never attacked or attempted to conquer Spain, the homeland of our opponent, but only to free Spain's colonies.

The very distance from the base of operations, which makes the United States comparatively safe from attack from Japan if we are at all adequately defended, makes Japan almost equally safe from attack from us.

Distance may lend enchantment to the view, but it certainly adds difficulty to any military or naval enterprise.

Theodore Roosevelt, who was a practical soldier, always realized this and considered war upon us by Japan and by us upon Japan equally impractical and improbable if both were adequately prepared for defense.

There is no doubt of the adequacy of Japan's preparedness.

There may be some doubt of our own on the west coast.

Nevertheless our Navy, if concentrated in the Pacific, would protect us from all aggression except sporadic air attack.

However, if any part of our Navy were required for defense of the Atlantic coast, our ratio of naval strength compared to Japan's would no longer be 5 to 3.73. It might be 2.50 to 3.73 in favor of Japan.

Then we could not be so sure that the air attack would be sporadic.

It might be sustained and might result in the destruction of our wonderful west-coast cities.

The plain facts are that we are not strong enough to be dictatorial.

We are not sufficiently prepared to wage offensive war and the wisest and safest thing we can do is to keep out of war, at least until we are prepared for it.

We cannot win battles with ships which are "under order" and which it will take 3 or 4 years to build.

We cannot make soldiers without equipment which it will take a year or two to provide.

We have not even got our air-defense forces on a modern basis, and as for coast-defense guns and air-defense guns, we are dangerously and ridiculously deficient.

For nearly 8 years nothing has been done, although billions have been spent to prepare for war, and now this impractical and improvident Government of ours is considering projecting us into war without adequate equipment or preparation—without effective defense from the attack we would invite.

Would it not be well to consider not only what might happen to Japan, but what might happen to the United States.

Do we desire, like poor France, to precipitate a war for which we are not prepared?

How silly it seems now for France to be indicting Daladier and his government for having gotten it into war.

What satisfaction can there be in such action?

How much better it would have been for France to have kept out of a war in which it had so much to lose and so little to gain.

How much better it would be for us to learn from the experience of others and keep out of a war for which we are in no way prepared—not to one-tenth the extent that France was prepared.

We have nothing to gain in a war with Japan.

We have everything to lose.

There is nothing that Japan has that we want to take.

There is nothing that we have that we want war with Japan to destroy—not our youth—not our cities—not our slowly reviving prosperity—not our social system—not our peace and happiness.

Let us realize and appreciate our benefits.

Let us conserve and protect our advantages.

Let us maintain the independence our fathers won for us and the isolation God in His goodness gave us.

South America Doubts United States Power in Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, we are all extremely interested in what is going to take place in South America, perhaps before this war ends, but certainly immediately after the war ends, because within the past year we have suddenly become more thoroughly interested in our neighbors to the south than ever before, although our distinguished and beloved colleague, who unfortunately was taken from us a number of months ago, the beloved J. Hamilton Lewis, took every occasion to mention that interest on the floor of the Senate from day to day.

The Washington Daily News is now publishing—the series began yesterday—articles pertaining to the situation in South America, relating to all subjects in which we naturally find ourselves interested. These articles are being written by Mr. William Philip Simms, who has recently made a 15,000-mile tour of the republics in Central and South America. I am confident that some of our colleagues have taken advantage of the opportunity of reading these articles, because they are excellent, in my humble opinion. The first appeared yesterday, entitled "South America Doubts United States Power in Crisis." I ask that it be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTH AMERICA DOUBTS UNITED STATES POWER IN CRISIS

(By William Philip Simms)

(EDITOR'S NOTE: Mr. Simms, who got out of Paris just ahead of the German troops and flew back to the United States, left almost at once on an aerial swing around South America. Today, in the first of a series of dispatches, he tells what he found in the Latin countries.)

American history hangs in the balance. The way the balance will swing depends upon whether Hitler crushes England or comes to grief against the white cliffs of Dover.

That, in a paragraph, is the well-nigh unanimous conviction of statesmen, diplomats, and businessmen south of the Caribbean as expressed to me during a 15,000-mile journey by Pan-American Airways which took me almost to Cape Horn.

The whole of the Western Hemisphere, as they see it, is face to face with the acutest dangers. This, they agree, is particularly true of the United States.

If Hitler wins his "blitzkrieg" against the British Isle, South America will almost certainly go totalitarian. That is, the more important countries will. And if they do, their ties with Germany will immediately tighten, and the United States may find itself isolated.

The Havana conference, leading South Americans told me, changed none of the fundamentals. If and when it comes to a showdown, the United States will have to bear the brunt of any invasion—whether economic or military.

Economically, South Americans are prepared to play ball with a Hitler-dominated Europe and a Japanized Asia. I found surprisingly few who expressed fear that political control might follow in the wake of a revived German trade.

Militarily, in the modern sense, they have nothing to fight with. Hence the chief meaning of the act of Habana is that the United States is now privileged to use its own Army, Navy, and air force to prevent Germany, Italy, or Japan from taking over British, French, and Dutch possessions in this hemisphere—a privilege the United States has already been claiming under the Monroe Doctrine for 117 years.

SITUATION HAS CHANGED

Even so, there is a growing belief among South Americans that the United States, at present, is wholly unprepared to make the Monroe Doctrine stick as intended. In the past Uncle Sam has waved the Doctrine under the noses of meddling foreign powers and warned them to keep hands off the Western World, all the way from Alaska's Point Barrow to Tierra del Fuego.

"And it has worked," I told an Argentinean pridefully. "They've kept their hands off."

"Sure," he replied. "But that was because Britain has always maintained some sort of balance of power in Europe—the only area from which any real challenge might have come. In fact, it was a British foreign secretary, George Canning, who suggested a doctrine. And as long as Britain looked on it with favor, no other power felt like doing anything about it."

"And now?" I asked.

"If Germany wins, she will dominate Europe. There will be no balance of power, and probably no British Fleet to stand between us and whatever unscrupulous nations might wish to expand in our direction. With nothing to fear from a down-and-out England and France—or from Russia, whose chief desire of the moment is to see the United States and Japan in a war so she can gobble up the pieces—what's to keep Hitler from crossing the Atlantic?"

THREAT FROM ORIENT

I said Uncle Sam's Navy might keep it from crossing. He said: "And leave Hawaii, the Philippines, your rubber and tin routes to the East Indies, and the Pacific approaches to Panama Canal unguarded? Have you any guaranty that Japan won't strike the moment you mix with Germany in the Atlantic?"

"The dictators," he continued, rubbing it in, "have a way of striking without warning. That is one of the lessons of the past year. Another is that they hit when and where they know their victims are weakest. The States can rearm adequately, of course, for they have both the money and the men. But can they—and will they—rearm in time?"

It may surprise you and hurt your pride to hear this, but South Americans seem to doubt our ability to cope with the totalitarian world now aborning. It is not surprising, therefore, that they hesitate to antagonize the totalitarian powers now in control of the areas which, in the past, have provided a market for 60 to 70 percent of their exports.

They are waiting to see which way the cat is going to jump.

Lindbergh Pleads Against Mixing in Europe's Affairs in Soldiers Field Rally at Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 6 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, Col. Charles A. Lindbergh will live in American history long after his little critics now swirling around his shoe tops are wholly forgotten. His outstanding Americanism cannot be questioned. His prophesies away back in 1936 as to the future course of history and the comparative strength of Germany's air force with other European nations now stand revealed as perfect and correct.

Let America never forget the great Lindbergh family. Their wisdom is the wisdom of great American patriots. The colonel has the good sense to follow in the footsteps of the fathers and founders of our country. Long live Colonel Lindbergh and the great cause he represents.

I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered by Colonel Lindbergh at Soldiers Field, Chicago, on last Sunday may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Several weeks have passed since I received the honor of your invitation to speak in Chicago. At that time it was essential to create strong and immediate opposition to the trend toward war which was taking place in this country.

The agitation for our entry into the war was increasing with alarming rapidity. Hysteria had mounted to the point where antiparachute corps were being formed to defend American cities against air attacks from Europe. Greenland, with its Arctic climate, its mountainous terrain, and its ice-filled seas, was called an easy stepping stone for German bombing planes invading America.

FOREIGN PROPAGANDA CITED

Cartoons showed the Atlantic Ocean reduced to the width of the English Channel. American safety was said to depend upon the success of European armies. Foreign propaganda was in full swing, and it seemed in many ways that we were approaching the greatest crisis in the history of our country.

But events move swiftly in this modern world, and the true character of a nation lies beneath such surface foam. When the danger of foreign war was fully realized by our people the underlying tradition of American independence arose, and in recent weeks its voice has thundered through the weaker cries for war.

We have by no means escaped the foreign entanglements and favoritisms that Washington warned us against when he passed the guidance of our Nation's destiny to the hands of future generations. We have participated deeply in the intrigues of Europe, and not always in an open, "democratic" way.

CONSTANT VIGILANCE URGED—WARNING ISSUED ON INTERESTS SEEKING WAR ENTRY

There are still interests in this country and abroad who will do their utmost to draw us into the war. Against these interests we must be continuously on guard. But American opinion is now definitely and overwhelmingly against our involvement.

Both political parties have declared against our entry into the war. People are beginning to realize that the problems of Europe cannot be solved by the interference of America. We have at last started to build and to plan for the defense of our own continent. By these acts our eyes are turned once more in the direction of security and peace, for if our own military forces are strong, no foreign nation can invade us, and, if we do not interfere with their affairs, none will desire to.

Since we have decided against entering the war in Europe, it is time for us to consider the relationship we will have with Europe after this war is over. It is only by using the utmost intelligence in establishing and maintaining this relationship that we can keep America out of war in the future.

I have a different outlook toward Europe than most people in America. In consequence, I am advised to speak guardedly on the subject of the war. I am told that one must not stand too strongly against the trend of the times, and that, to be effective, what one says must meet with general approval.

OFFERS OPINION AS CITIZEN

There is much to be said for this argument, yet, right or wrong, it is contrary to the values that I hold highest in life. I prefer to say what I believe, or not to speak at all. I would far rather have your respect for the sincerity of what I say than attempt to win your applause by confining my discussion to popular concepts. Therefore, I speak to you today as I would speak to close friends, rather than as one is supposed to address a large audience.

I do not offer my opinion as an expert but rather as a citizen who is alarmed at the position our country has reached in this era of experts. As laymen we are often told that the solution of difficult problems should be left to the specialist.

But since specialists differ in the solutions they recommend, they must at least allow us the privilege of choosing those we wish to follow. And in making this choice it seems that we are back where we started and must form an opinion of our own.

FALSE IMPRESSIONS PREVALENT

I found conditions in Europe to be very different from our concept of them here in the United States. Anyone who takes the trouble to read through back issues of our newspapers cannot fail to realize what a false impression we had of the belligerent nations.

We were told that Germany was ripe for revolution, that her rearmament was a bluff, that she lacked officers, that she flew her airplanes from one field to another so they would be counted again and again by foreign observers.

We were informed that Russia had the most powerful air fleet in the world; that the French Army was superior to any in Europe; that the British Navy was more than a match for the German air force; that Germany lacked enough food, fuel, and raw material to wage war; that the Maginot line was impregnable; that Italy would never enter a war against England. Statements of this sort have issued forth in an endless stream from Europe, and anyone who questioned their accuracy was called a Nazi agent.

MISLED ABOUT EUROPE—BOTH MILITARY AND POLITICAL CONDITIONS DIFFERENT

These examples show how greatly we have been misled about the military conditions in Europe. If one goes still farther back, he will find that we have also been misled about political conditions. It has seemed obvious to me for many years that the situation in Europe would have to change, either by agreement or by war. I hoped that we had reached a degree of civilization where change might come by agreement. Living in Europe made me fear that it would come only through war.

There is a proverb in China which says that "when the rich become too rich and the poor too poor something happens." This applies to nations as well as to men.

When I saw the wealth of the British Empire I felt that the rich had become too rich. When I saw the poverty of Central Europe I felt that the poor had become too poor. That something would happen was blazoned even on the skies of Europe by mounting thousands of fighting aircraft.

GERMAN STRENGTH GIGANTIC

From 1936 to 1939, as I traveled through European countries, I saw the phenomenal military strength of Germany growing like a giant at the side of an aged and complacent England. France was awake to her danger, but far too occupied with personal ambitions, industrial troubles, and internal politics to make more than a feeble effort to rearm. In England there was organization without spirit. In France there was spirit without organization. In Germany there were both.

I realized that I was witnessing a clash between the heirs of another war. A generation had passed since the treaty of Versailles. The sons of victory and the sons of defeat were about to meet on the battlefields of their fathers.

As I traveled first among those who had won, and then among those who had lost, the words of a French philosopher kept running through my mind: "Man thrives on adversity."

The underlying issue was clear. It was not the support of democracy, or the so-called democratic nations would have given more assistance to the struggling republic of post-war Germany.

It was not a crusade for Christianity, or the Christian nations of the west would have carried their battle flags to the confiscated churches of Russia.

It was not the preservation of small and helpless nations or sanctions would have been followed by troops in Abyssinia, and England would not have refused to cooperate with the United States in Manchuria.

ISSUE ONE OF OLDEST—TERRITORY AND WEALTH ROOTS OF CONFLICT

The issue was one of the oldest and best known among men. It concerned the division of territory and wealth between nations. It has caused conflict in Europe since European history began.

The longer I lived in Europe the more I felt that no outside influence could solve the problems of European nations, or bring them lasting peace. They must work out their destiny, as we must work out ours. I am convinced that the better acquainted we in America become with the background of European conflicts the less we will desire to take part in them.

But here I would like to make this point clear: While I advocate the noninterference by America in the internal affairs of Europe, I believe it is of the utmost importance for us to cooperate with Europe in our relationships with the other peoples of the earth. It is only by cooperation that we can maintain the supremacy of our western civilization and the right of our commerce to proceed unmolested throughout the world. Neither they nor we are strong enough to police the earth against the opposition of the other.

NEW DOMINANCE POSSIBLE

In the past we have dealt with a Europe dominated by England and France. In the future we may have to deal with a Europe dominated by Germany. But whether England or Germany wins this war, western civilization will still depend upon two great centers, one in each hemisphere.

With all the aids of modern science, neither of these centers is in a position to attack the other successfully as long as the defenses of both are reasonably strong. A war between us could easily last for generations, and bring all civilization tumbling down, as has happened more than once before. An agreement between us could maintain civilization and peace throughout the world as far into the future as we can see.

But we are often told that if Germany wins this war cooperation will be impossible, and treaties no more than scraps of paper. I reply that cooperation is never impossible when there is sufficient gain on both sides, and that treaties are seldom torn apart when they do not cover a weak nation.

URGES REARMING FOR DEFENSE

I would be among the last to advocate depending upon treaties for our national safety. I believe that we should rearm fully for the defense of America, and that we should never make the type of treaty that would lay us open to invasion, if it were broken. But if we refuse to consider treaties with the dominant nation of Europe, regardless of who that may be, we remove all possibility of peace.

Nothing is to be gained by shouting names and pointing the finger of blame across the ocean. Our grandstand advice to England, and our criticism of her campaigns, has been neither wanted nor helpful.

Our accusations of aggression and barbarism on the part of Germany simply bring back echoes of hypocrisy and Versailles. Our hasty condemnation of a French Government, struggling desperately to save a defeated nation from complete collapse, can do nothing but add to famine, hatred, and chaos.

If we desire to keep America out of war, we must take the lead in offering a plan for peace. That plan should be based upon the welfare of America. It should be backed by an impregnable system of defense. It should incorporate terms of mutual advantage. But it should not involve the internal affairs of Europe; they never were, and never will be, carried on according to our desires.

Let us offer Europe a plan for the progress and protection of the western civilization of which they and we each form a part. But whatever their reply may be, let us carry on the American destiny of which our forefathers dreamed as they cut their farm lands from the virgin forests. What would they think of the claim that our frontiers lie in Europe?

COUNSELS GUARD OF INDEPENDENCE

Let us guard the independence that the soldiers of our revolution won against overwhelming odds. What I ask you, would those soldiers say if they could hear this Nation, grown 130,000,000 strong, being told that only the British Fleet protects us from invasion?

Our Nation was born of courage and hardship. It grew on the fearless spirit of the pioneer. Now that it has become one of the greatest powers on earth, ours must not be the generation that kneels in fear of future hardships, or of invasion by a Europe already torn by war.

I do not believe we will ever accept a philosophy of calamity, weakness, and fear. I have faith in an American army, an American navy, an American air force—and, most important of all, the American character which, in normal times, lies quietly beneath the surface of this Nation.

My Report to the People of Grays Harbor County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with my established practice, I hereby render my report and account of my official record to the citizens of Grays Harbor County.

I agree with the many thousands of citizens who have written to me that our first task remains that of keeping our country out of war. I shall continue my vigorous support of neutrality legislation. We are the only neutral nation in the world whose ships and citizens have not been attacked.

I shall cooperate vigorously in supporting President Roosevelt's national-defense program, and am remaining at my post of duty in order to do so.

May I take this opportunity to sincerely thank my fellow citizens for their kind expressions of approval of my work in Congress. Their generous letters have been a source of inspiration and encouragement.

Influence in Congress depends upon seniority of service on important committees. Why throw away the influence of seniority and experience? What do candidates have to offer except their own personal ambition? I now rank sixth out of a membership of 27 on the powerful Rivers and Harbors Committee, having started at the bottom of the ladder in 1933. As a direct result, we have had more regular worthy river and harbor, jetty and flood-control projects approved and carried out in southwest Washington during my period of service than during the entire previous history of our State. It is also my privilege to be chairman of the Pensions Committee, which gives me added rank and prestige in the House. I also am serving on the important Committee on Education, vital to the students and faculties in our public schools and colleges, and on the Indian Affairs and War Claims Committees.

When politicians are desperate they sometimes resort to issues of the most trivial and amusing nature, and this year for the first time the Congressman's county of legal residence is seemingly being made such an issue.

I have been a permanent resident of southwest Washington for 30 years and have been continuously visiting all the communities in the district and am therefore thoroughly familiar with conditions and problems in every community. However, length of residence in the district is important, for a comparative newcomer from a distant part of the State could not be expected to know our people nor our problems and would consequently not be qualified to represent our interests effectively.

The particular city or county in which the Congressman resides has absolutely no bearing on his effectiveness to serve his district, which depends on his length of service, his rank, and his experience.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

The gentleman from Texas, Congressman MARVIN JONES, of Texas, who is retiring after 24 years in Congress, paid a tribute the other day to the seasoned Members of the House.

The rest of the States, he said, should follow the example of Texas in reelecting its Congressmen, then they would control more committee chairmanships. Texas, with 21 Members in the House today, holds 5 chairmanships, he pointed out. It is exceeded only by New York with 6 out of its 45 Members holding committee chairmanships. The Texas Congressman ended by quoting former Speaker Champ Clark:

A man has to learn to be a Congressman just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

IMPROVED BUSINESS CONDITIONS

The steady improvement in business conditions and recovery from the depths of 1929–33 continues.

I shall never forget the gloom and despair of the merchants, laborers, farmers, and people generally in 1932 in Hoquiam, Aberdeen, Montesano, Elma, Oakville, Porter, Malone, Copalis Beach, Quinault, Moclips, Pacific Beach, Taholah, and all the communities in Grays Harbor County. There were hardly any jobs or money in circulation—prices were down and there was no market. Conditions are vastly different now, and we are far better situated than we were then.

GOVERNMENT AND COOPERATION

Not only has this beneficial change been wrought but our Government has also aided and cooperated in the construction of many worth-while projects which make our local communities better places in which to live.

GRAYS HARBOR JETTIES—INNER CHANNEL OF GRAYS HARBOR

When I entered upon my service as a Member of Congress in 1933 and succeeded in obtaining membership on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I had two very difficult tasks, to the performance of which I had pledged my best and untiring efforts. The first was to secure, if possible, a reversal of the previous unfavorable engineering reports and failure to secure committee and congressional action on the Grays Harbor high-water-jetty projects, which we of Grays Harbor had sought without success for 20 years. I introduced a resolution for review of the unfavorable reports, and after obtaining its adoption by the Rivers and Harbors Committee, succeeded in my endeavors to have the Board of Army Engineers, Washington, D. C., go to Grays Harbor and make a personal inspection of the condition of the harbor and observe the extent to which the old jetties constructed 30 years ago had been beaten down and washed away. When the district and division engineers handed down conflicting reports, it became even more difficult to obtain the desired reversal of the previous rejections of the project by the entire Board of Engineers, but this was finally accomplished. Complete hearings were then held before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, before which I made a full presentation of the project. After receiving the approval of the committee the project was subsequently included in the omnibus river and harbor bill, and the project was authorized by Congress and items included for its construction in appropriation bills, until, altogether, $4,925,000 has been expended to date for the reconstruction of the south jetty, and the first $500,000 has been secured to commence the construction of the north jetty, at an estimated cost of $2,365,000, a total investment by the Federal Government of approximately $7,290,000 on a project which had been abandoned and was considered hopeless until I came to Congress.

My second task was to save, if possible, the citizens and taxpayers the cost of dredging the inner channel of Grays Harbor. This was also an extremely difficult task. From 1919 to 1934 the citizens of Grays Harbor paid annually $58,000 for dredging the inner channel of Grays Harbor, amounting to approximately $1,000,000, which we paid in millage on our taxes on our homes, businesses, and farms. In 1934, after following through the protracted procedure, and finally gaining the approval of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the engineers' reports, and then securing the legislative authorization by Congress and adoption of the project, and the necessary appropriations, we had this burden shifted to the Federal Government. In the past 6 years this action has resulted in an actual total saving to the taxpayers, home owners, businessmen, and farmers of Grays Harbor County of $348,000 in cash money, which we have not had to pay in taxes as we had done in the past. This saving of $348,000 is more than the entire cost of paying all the salaries of all the county officials of Grays Harbor County during this period. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have received at all times from the efficient port manager, W. J. Murphy, and the port commissioners.

MONTESANO POST OFFICE

The citizens of Montesano sought a new post-office building for 20 years previous to my election to Congress in 1932. I immediately introduced a bill to authorize its construction and in 1934 obtained the allocation of funds. Early in 1935 actual construction was commenced and on November 16, 1935, the fine new building was completed and formally dedicated. It is considered by postal officials to be one of the most beautiful and practical buildings of its size in the State and is a credit to the progressive city of Montesano. The building, site, furnishings, and fixtures cost $59,836.

Bills for new post-office buildings for Aberdeen and Elma have been advanced to favorable positions and they will be constructed whenever a new public building program is undertaken, depending upon the duration of the national-defense emergency.

FLOOD CONTROL—HOQUIAM

Following the floods in 1933 I secured the enactment by Congress in 1934 of the first bills ever enacted into law for flood-control surveys of the Chehalis, Cowlitz, Columbia, and Lewis Rivers. In 1935 I obtained a change in the requirement heretofore made by the Federal Government in other parts of the country that the local communities match the Federal Government in defraying the cost of dikes and flood preventive work. The Hoquiam project was the first project in the State of Washington and in the United States where the Federal Government bore the entire cost, $205,000, which saved the property owners and taxpayers 55 percent of that sum, approximately $112,750, as the original basis was for a grant of 45 percent and a loan to the city of 55 percent at interest. City Attorney James P. H. Callahan had written me:

> The State has no funds to match the Federal appropriation * * * and the city cannot raise the amount required legally or otherwise.

Finally, after stressing to Gen. E. M. Markham, the Chief of United States Army Engineers, the financial straits Hoquiam was in, I was notified by him on August 22, 1935, that the Government would grant to the city of Hoquiam $205,000 as an outright grant, the only provision being that the city had to furnish the necessary rights-of-way and construct approximately 3,100 feet of wood sheet-pile bulkhead at an estimated cost of $20,000. City Attorney Callahan, who prepared all the applications and documents in behalf of the city of Hoquiam, and with whom I had all my correspondence relating to the matter, wrote me:

> On behalf of the citizens of Hoquiam, I sincerely thank you for your efforts.

Hoquiam has received numerous school, street, sewer, cemetery, tennis court, playfield, and other useful Federal projects costing approximately $600,000.

ABERDEEN PROJECTS

In addition to the jetties and inner channel, water system, streets, sewers, and culverts, storm sewers, drainage, park, Aberdeen Game Hatchery at a cost of $77,054, school, road, Aberdeen Target Range, and a great variety of municipal projects have been constructed in Aberdeen, aggregating a total cost of approximately $1,000,000. To this should be added the $200,000 W. P. A. city-wide street-improvement project which was recently approved by President Roosevelt, with work to start about the middle of August.

AIR AND SEAPLANE BASE

I have introduced a bill to authorize an appropriation of $1,000,000 for an airplane and seaplane base on Grays Harbor, as a companion measure to a similar bill for Willapa Harbor, aeronautical experts to decide which site is preferable. The proposal will be studied and considered as a part of the national-defense program.

BONNEVILLE—$70,000,000 PROJECT

I shall always be proud of my sponsorship of the original legislation creating the great Bonneville project and my active participation during the years in every step to bring its benefits to the citizens and communities of Grays Harbor County and our district. On March 4, 1938, the late John D. Ross, administrator of the Bonneville project, wrote me:

> I wish to express my deep appreciation of your efforts in obtaining the Bonneville appropriation through the House. The cooperation which I received while in Washington and since I left has pleased me very much.

Bonneville will always remain a monument to the memory of this sturdy champion of public power for all the people.

On March 27, 1939, Charles E. Carey, acting administrator, wrote me:

> With friends like you in Congress we feel that the future of Bonneville is in safe hands. We will do everything we can to see that your friends in southwestern Washington are fully advised of your service and active support of the Bonneville project.

In this session of Congress I appeared twice before the Appropriations Committee and testified at length in support of increased appropriations this year, which we succeeded in obtaining so the work can continue unabated.

Under date of June 20, 1940, Dr. Paul J. Raver, Administrator, Bonneville Power Administration, wrote me:

> I want to express my appreciation for the very able assistance which you gave this administration in connection with our request for an appropriation sufficient to meet our construction needs to get power from the Bonneville Dam to the market areas.

I have actively supported our rural-electrification projects, which are, of course, valuable adjuncts to Bonneville.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

During the period from March 4, 1933, to June 30, 1939, there was expended by the Federal Government in Grays Harbor County, in addition to the jetties and inner channel, the sum of $8,804,150, and loaned therein the additional sum of $2,955,909, a total of $11,760,059.

Flood control, drainage, school, playgrounds, streets, fish hatchery, game hatchery, road, water system, sewer, park, bridge, cemetery, fire department, tennis court, city buildings, recreation camps, community buildings, athletic fields projects have been provided and will constitute valuable community assets for many years to come and serve future generations as well as our own.

MY PROGRESSIVE LABOR RECORD

During the period of my service as a Member of Congress I have supported and voted for every piece of legislation of benefit to labor. I realize that our business prosperity is measured by the income and wages received by labor and agriculture. I have therefore supported their reasonable demands 100 percent. We have conferred upon labor the same right as that enjoyed by their employers, namely, to bargain collectively in regard to wages, working hours, and working conditions. I have had the active support of every branch of organized labor and the railroad brotherhoods ever since I have been a Member of Congress, and intend to continue to merit and deserve their support in the future as I have in the past. I have likewise heartily supported all legislation designed to accord to our Federal and Postal workers more liberal treatment. They serve the public faithfully and efficiently and should be treated accordingly.

WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

For 4 years I served as a member of the steering committee of 22 House Members which led the successful fight for the soldiers' bonus. Instead of paying our veterans in bullets, tear bombs, and poison gas, the way the bonus army was "paid," we paid in cash in 1936 the bonus which had been delinquent since 1924. Veterans in Grays Harbor County thus received $1,307,487.64. They had considered it a matter of such vital importance that on December 18, 1934, and December 20, 1934, some 72 business firms and veterans carried full-page ads in the Aberdeen World and Hoquiam Washingtonian setting forth the benefits which would, and did, result from such payment.

I have sponsored two bills familiar to every Spanish War veteran, the Smith bill of 1935, paying their pensions in full, and the Philippine travel-pay bill of 1940, as well as numerous other measures for hospitalization, increased benefits, and so forth.

I have favored every bill in the interests of the veterans of the World War, their widows, and dependents which has come before Congress, and am nationally known for my active support of veterans' legislation. I shall continue this policy, for it is my firm belief that it is the solemn duty and sacred obligation of our Government never to forget but always to remember and to compensate to the fullest possible extent those who have defended our Republic. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have always received from the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, the United Spanish War Veterans, the Disabled American Veterans, and their auxiliaries.

FEDERAL HOUSING—HOME OWNERS' LOANS—BANK AND SAVINGS AND LOAN DEPOSITS

As one of the five Members of the House who conferred with President Roosevelt March 20, 1934, and sponsored the first housing legislation in Congress, I am gratified at the benefits which have accrued therefrom to our people. In Grays Harbor County 253 citizens have received loans aggregating $721,100 for the construction, modernization, and repair of their homes. This has been of vast benefit to the workers in the building trades, including electricians, painters, and plumbers, and the lumber, plywood, shingle, and other allied industries.

I actively supported the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act and am glad that 521 citizens in Grays Harbor County have received loans aggregating $859,965.79. I expressed my belief in this legislation on April 28, 1933, in these words:

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to render available the sum of $2,000,000,000 to restore, redeem, rehabilitate, and save the homes of many of the American people; and, Mr. Speaker, when we save the homes of the American people, we save America.

Depositors in the 8 banks in Grays Harbor County have their deposits up to $5,000 insured by the Federal Government under the acts of Congress which I heartily supported and voted for. The 5,640 depositors in 5 savings and loan associations likewise have their deposits insured under the same legislation. I am happy and proud that the Roosevelt administration has provided this protection and security for our people and that it has been my privilege to have a humble part in bringing about these great reforms which should have been introduced many years ago.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

I have been an ardent, outspoken advocate of old-age pensions during my service in Congress. I have continued the interest, which as a veteran member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, I have manifested for the past 25 years. I have on every occasion promptly signed every petition to bring old-age pension and general-welfare legislation before the Congress for action.

I was the first Member of Congress to publicly espouse the Townsend plan in 1934 and in a brief 6 years have, as a member of the steering committee, actively participated in the growth of our movement until today we are approximating a sufficient following in the House of Representatives to enact our legislation in its present form into law. The United States Senate recently for the first time authorized a thorough study of the Townsend plan. In view of this progress we confidently expect to reelect a sufficient number of our old supporters and elect a sufficient number of new supporters in the elections this year to enact H. R. 8264 into law in the next Congress.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

As an active member of the House Committee on Education, I have vigorously favored providing in public-works and relief-appropriation bills adequate funds to aid in paying the salaries of school teachers and maintain, repair, and improve our public-school buildings, as well as institutions of higher learning, as I consider the cause of public education and the recommendations of our Parent-Teacher Associations to be paramount.

I favor the following program:

First. Adequate free public education for the children of the United States.

Second. Adequate pay for public-school teachers as a matter of justice and as a means of retaining in and attracting to the teaching profession the most competent, devoted, and best-equipped men and women.

Third. An annual minimum of at least 8 months' teaching in the public schools of all the States.

Fourth. An adequate number of safe, commodious, and well-equipped school buildings.

Fifth. Free textbooks for all public-school pupils.

Sixth. Adequate assistance by the Federal Government, through appropriations and otherwise, in accomplishing the foregoing objects.

Seventh. Such of the allied purposes as may serve the best interests of the teachers and pupils and the Parent-Teacher Associations in making the public schools a more effective, far-reaching, and American force in local, State, and National life.

FARM LEGISLATION

The farm problem is recognized as the most difficult with which we have to deal, having been acute since 1920. We have done more for the farmer than any previous national administration and have, since 1932, doubled our farm income. We have recaptured our lost foreign export trade in agricultural products, without sacrificing our home markets, and should you desire the official Government statistics bearing on this entire subject, please write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., or write to me and I shall be glad to obtain them for you. Self-seeking politicians running for office do not hesitate to distort and misrepresent the facts. Therefore, if you are interested in ascertaining the true facts, I shall be glad to assist you in doing so. We have not entirely solved the farm problem, but we have made more progress toward a solution than any previous national administration.

The condition of the farmer everywhere is much better than it was in 1932, when his prices and market were the worst in the history of modern agriculture. Think back to 1932 and compare the lot of the average farmer in your own neighborhood as it was then with his condition today in 1940 and you will realize this fact. We intend to keep on helping the farmer. It remains my opinion that the Grange cost-of-production plan to insure the farmer parity prices with industry, offers the best solution of the farm problem. In the next Congress I shall again vigorously support it. During my entire service in Congress I have never cast a single vote detrimental to agriculture and would be glad to have you verify this fact by writing to Mr. Ervin E. King, Master of the Washington State Grange, 3104 Western Avenue, Seattle, Wash., or Mr. Fred Brenckman, legislative representative, National Grange, 1343 H Street, NW., Washington, D. C.

FISH AND GAME RESOURCES

One of the most important enterprises which can be encouraged by the Federal Government is the developing, propagating, and conserving of our fish and game resources. I have, therefore, at all times cooperated with the House Special Committee on Conservation of Wildlife Resources and the various pogy, wildlife, sportsmen's, game, and rod and gun clubs and associations in southwest Washington. I voted for the Robertson-Pittman Act last year and the appropriation this year of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. The Federal contribution to our State is estimated at $60,575, to be matched by the State contributing $20,191.66, a total of $80,766.66. I have actively cooperated in obtaining W. P. A. and Federal funds for fish hatcheries, fish ponds, and fish and game preserves and wildlife projects in southwest Washington.

I have given prompt attention to the requests received from the holders of fish and game licenses in southwest Washington for information regarding the Federal laws and pending legislation relating to the subject of wildlife.

LUMBER, SHINGLES, PULP, PLYWOOD INDUSTRIES

During my entire service in Congress on every occasion, without a single exception, I have supported and voted for beneficial legislation desired by the lumber, shingle, pulp, and plywood industries and advantageous to their workers, and have at all times extended to them my whole-hearted cooperation. Self-seeking politicians apparently have no scruples in misrepresenting the facts. Therefore, if you wish to verify my statement in regard to my official record, I would suggest that you write to the official legislative representatives of the organizations to which our local industries belong: Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager, West Coast Lumbermen's Association, 364 Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., 340 White-Henry-Stuart Building, Seattle, Wash.; Henry Bahr, counsel, National Lumber Manufacturers Association, 1337 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D. C.; Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, Tacoma Building, Tacoma, Wash.; O. M. Porter, secretary, United States Pulp Producers Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

In the general election 2 years ago, in 1938, my Republican opponent had the nerve to display a bundle of shingles and talk about protection for shingles. At that time, and for 5 years previously, the shingle industry and workers enjoyed a 25-percent quota—the only protection in 25 years. The Republicans kept shingles on the duty-free list for 25 years without any quota, causing Senator HOMER T. BONE, in the campaign in 1932, to say:

The shingle industry was ruined because of this fact.

In the period since I took my seat in Congress in 1933, the shingle industry has been revived, old mills remodeled and equipped with new machinery, and new mills built until now we have three times as many plants and number of shingle weavers employed in 1932.

November 18, 1935, Charles McGrath, secretary-manager of the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

I hasten to send you this brief note to thank you for the fine help we received from you in our fight to secure the import quota on Canadian shingles. I want to express to you my appreciation of your efforts in our behalf.

To render the quota more effective, I introduced the bill which became law for a census of the shingle industry. On May 27, 1937, Mr. McGrath wrote, when President Roosevelt signed my bill:

This news is about the most important that has come to red-cedar shingle manufacturers and the logging and lumber operators associated with the shingle business.

February 1, 1938, the United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

At the annual membership meeting of this association held in Tacoma, February 1, 1938, a resolution was unanimously approved instructing the secretary to write you expressing the gratitude of this association for your faithful services in our behalf in connection with the import limitations on red-cedar shingles.

On November 2, 1938, the following news article was published in the Hoquiam Washingtonian:

Shingle weavers commend SMITH. A resolution endorsing MARTIN E. SMITH in his campaign for reelection to Congress was passed this week by Grays Harbor Shingle Weavers, Local 2576. The resolution endorsing SMITH is being sent to all shingle-weaver unions in the district council. The resolution commends Congressman SMITH for diligent work in limiting importation of Canadian shingles into the United States.

In this Congress I have actively cooperated in efforts to secure aid for the workers and the shingle industry. Following vigorous efforts before the State Department and Ways and Means Committee, we have recently secured the passage of a bill providing for a duty of 25 cents per square on red-cedar shingle imported from Canada—the first duty imposed in 29 years. On June 28, 1940, David M. Williams, secretary-manager, United States Red Cedar Shingle Industry, Inc., wrote me:

The final passage of our shingle bill in the Senate on June 22 brings to a conclusion the long struggle to put shingles back on the duty list. To say that we are pleased expresses our feelings very mildly.

Having full knowledge of the difficulty of getting a tariff bill through Congress, and particularly one giving protection to the shingle or lumber industries, we are grateful for the continuous thought and effort you have given our affairs.

All during the struggle, since January 1, it has been heartening to know that you were tirelessly working for the passage of our shingle bill, and it has been of great value to the writer to be able to confer with you at any time when a conference was deemed necessary. You have been on the job for us, and we are very appreciative.

With best wishes for your continued success, we remain,

Yours truly,

UNITED STATES RED CEDAR SHINGLE INDUSTRY, INC.,
By DAVID M. WILLIAMS,
Secretary-Manager.

I would suggest that when the candidates of the opposing party talk about shingles that citizens ask them about the do-nothing record of their party for 25 years, and the do-something record of the Roosevelt administration, and request an explanation. I would appreciate citizens writing me briefly what explanation, if any, they give. I am curious, as you must be, after reading the foregoing recital of facts, to know what alibi and excuse they have to offer.

LUMBER EXCISE TAX

The lumber business is the best it has been in 10 years. Last year pay rolls and wages in private industry were the highest in the history of the State.

A candidate for Congress should have respect for the voters and for the office he is seeking. What about the candidate who deliberately circulates malicious falsehoods? Two years ago and again this year the same falsehood is being circulated and published that Members of Congress from our State, including myself, voted to reduce the excise tax on lumber. The best answer to this campaign lie was made December 12, 1938, by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager and legislative representative of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, of which our local lumber firms are members:

The west coast lumber industry has had the effective and loyal support of Mr. SMITH on every occasion when we have been asking for his help. He has voted for renewal of the excise tax on imported lumber on every occasion when the matter has been before Congress. He has supported our efforts to have lumber properly defined for taxing purposes, as in the classification of large timbers and with withdrawal of allowances for planing and milling. He has helped us in every question arising for the clarification and administration of the excise tax.

The West Coast Lumbermen's Association keeps wholly out of politics. I just want, as a matter of fairness, to point out that Mr. SMITH has been a very loyal and conscientious supporter of the interests of the lumber industry since he entered Congress. I feel it only square that this fact be made known.

Sincerely yours,

W. B. GREELEY,
Secretary-Manager.

My amendment of the lumber-import excise tax, known as the Smith amendment, introduced as H. R. 7934, was attached to the Revenue Act of 1938 and passed the Senate, was approved by President Roosevelt, and became law. It prevents deductions for tonguing, planing, and grooving of imported lumber, and is estimated to increase about 25 percent the excise tax, which is the tax unscrupulous candidates for Congress falsely accuse me of voting to reduce. April 4, 1938, Henry Bahr, counsel for the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, wrote me, as follows:

Regarding your amendment of the lumber-import excise tax, which was tacked on to the revenue bill in the Ways and Means Committee, and retained by the Senate last week, I am sure Colonel Greeley must have told you how sincerely we appreciate your helpful cooperation in this matter.

Candidates of the opposite party should be asked by the voters why their party, under the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930 and the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act of 1922, left lumber and shingles on the duty-free list, without any import excise tax or quota limitation, and provided 100 percent free trade with Canada. Such an explanation, if made, would be interesting, probably amusing.

PULP LEGISLATION

I am the author of H. R. 7312, the Smith bill, to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921, to plug up and curtail importations of foreign pulp in competition with our local product. This bill has received wide support from the pulp and sulfite workers unions, and the manufacturers. It has strong support in Congress. The United States Pulp Producers Association, O. M. Porter, has written me, as follows:

I am very glad to be able to tell you that the executive committee of this association has instructed me to do everything possible toward developing Nation-wide support of your bill (H. R. 7312) to amend the Antidumping Act of 1921.

The changed conditions suddenly caused by the invasion of the Scandinavian countries and removal temporarily of competition from that quarter has deferred immediate action, but the legislation is in fine shape for consideration in the next Congress.

PEELER LOG LEGISLATION

Past national administrations have permitted the exporting of peeler logs without hindrance so many years that now this, too, has created a problem to deal with. This has nothing to do with the reciprocal-trade agreements, which have made no change whatsoever. The question is simply one of whether we should limit the export of raw materials, the supply of which is becoming limited on account of our generosity in the past, which we now need for our own domestic use and manufacture by our own labor. I have vigorously favored the enactment of this legislation, which presents difficulties because it establishes a new precedent. Past neglect always renders application of the remedy difficult. The outlook for the enactment of this legislation in the near future is favorable on account of the hearings which have been held and the efforts which have been put forth in its behalf by the entire Washington congressional delegation. On May 24, 1940, Mr. Axel H. Oxholm, managing director, Pacific Forest Industries, with which plywood manufacturers in southwest Washington are affiliated, wrote me:

The board of directors held its annual meeting on May 21, and I was directed to express to you the board's appreciation of the valuable assistance which you have given in the peeler log matter.

APPOINTMENT TO ANNAPOLIS

Terry L. McGillicuddy, son of Mr. and Mrs. Dan McGillicuddy, of Aberdeen, was appointed to the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, in June 1936, on my recommendation, and graduated with honors this year. With the rank of ensign he was immediately assigned to duty with the fleet at Pearl Harbor.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION—CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

The National Youth Administration has made a splendid record in the State of Washington, and many young men and women in my district have greatly benefited from the program. Through the office of Mr. John H. Binns, Washington State administrator of the N. Y. A., I have obtained official figures on the out-of-school program and the school-work program which reflect the actual earnings of the young people. However, the figures for the college-work program do not take into account students living in my district but attending college elsewhere. There are, of course, a great many young men and women from southwest Washington at the University of Washington, Washington State College, and elsewhere, and they are receiving their full share of the college-work funds. In Grays Harbor County a total of 298 young men and women have participated in the out-of-school work program, receiving total monthly earnings of $5,662. Under the college-work program there are 29 students attending Grays Harbor Junior College, with a total yearly quota of $3,240. Ten schools of Grays Harbor County are included in the school-work program, with a total of 220 student workers and a total yearly quota of $8,194.

The useful and constructive work performed by the young men in the C. C. C. camps has received universal praise. In my district, in addition to building trails, roads, bridges, the prevention of floods and soil erosion, and other public improvements, their services in effectively fighting forest fires has resulted in a saving of millions of dollars. The young men themselves have benefited greatly from the training and instruction which they have received, and, of course, their own compensation and the allotments to their dependents have provided added purchasing power. The expenditures for materials and supplies in the vicinity of the camps have been a direct benefit to numerous business firms and merchants. C. C. C. camps have been in operation in practically every county in my district and the entire State of Washington.

AMERICA FOREVER—COMMUNISM, FASCISM, NAZI-ISM NEVER

On June 22, 1940, I voted for H. R. 5138, the most thorough and far-reaching revision of our immigration and deportation laws in the past 25 years. It is directed against all subversive, "fifth column," and un-American activities, and provides punishment for those who attempt to overthrow the Government by force and violence. H. R. 5138 as amended was carefully considered and provides effective remedies against all foreign "isms" without violating our Constitution and American traditions.

My friends, we have the finest country and best Government on earth. Let us keep them that way. There is no room in America for communism, fascism, nazi-ism. There is room for only one "ism," and that is Americanism. We are going to keep America out of Europe and are going to keep Europe out of America.

Economy in Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENTS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith a letter from a group of citizens in my district and commend its contents to the consideration of the administration and its leaders.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., August 1, 1940.

The Honorable JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please do your utmost to cut down all appropriations that are not absolutely necessary. In the interest of economy, we are prepared to forego some of the expensive services offered by Government bureaus and subsidies. These services will be missed, but unless we give up the nonessential ones, we cannot hope to get out of debt. Please favor a stable currency. Endeavor to repeal the act which allows the President to issue up to $3,000,000,000 of fiat money. Do what you can to stop the devaluation of the dollar. Gold that costs (in some cases) only $11 per ounce to produce, should not be worth $35 of our money. We do not need to lack currency as the Federal Reserve banks have power to issue approximately $42,500,000,000 (on the basis of $2.50 for each dollar gold certificate they own) but have currently issued only $5,000,000,000 in Federal Reserve notes.

Before removing men from industry for compulsory military training as proposed in the current Senate bill (Burke-Wadsworth, S. 4164) we should use every effort to place our present nonproductive manpower in the armed forces. Compulsory military training in peacetime for any regularly employed individual is national economic suicide and should be abhorred in our free America. Do your best to divert our huge relief allotments into our current preparedness drive.

Endeavor to prevent our Government from being panicked into further huge military appropriations. The threat to our country thus far is only economic unless we choose to make it military. Should we take this latter step, it is not desirable for us to waste money by "galloping off in all directions." Our military experts tell us that planes built today will be obsolete tomorrow. Let's tool up at once, but let's not throw our money away. The current European conflict should not be used as a smoke screen to cover up our Government debt, to replace current Treasury deficits, or as a lever to perpetuate the present administration. Earmark defense taxes for defense, not for offense, and not for other Government expenditures.

Very truly yours,

MILTON E. SMITH.
F. B. HEILMAN.
Mrs. RUTH K. SMITH.

That "Spontaneous" Demand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 6, 1940

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, millions of Americans "listened in" on the proceedings at Philadelphia and Chicago when Wendell Willkie was nominated by the Republican Party and Franklin D. Roosevelt won the third-term nomination of the Democrats. They demonstrated the tremendous interest of the people of the United States in the democratic process. Until all hours of the night they remained at their radios to hear the nominations, to listen to history in the making. Every man and woman in the Nation was waiting for the news, waiting anxiously.

And lo! in the midst of the Chicago convention, there came a voice, a mighty torrent of sound welling up from the loudspeakers of a million homes, a voice stridently insisting, "we want Roosevelt." Those who heard that repeated shout were hard put to it to understand the reaction in the Nation's newspapers throughout the week. They read repeatedly, "the convention was unenthusiastic. It was cold to the Roosevelt cry. It was positively frigid to the Wallace nomination."

All this was difficult to understand in the recollection of that penetrating voice. But the difficulty has been resolved, and in its resolution we meet a shocking situation which should be corrected, in the interest of accurate reporting.

Down in the bowels of the convention hall, a hidden microphone was at work. And seated before that microphone was Thomas D. Garry, superintendent of sewers in the city of Chicago. His was the magic voice which boomed out the name of the candidate at every possible opportunity. Seated at his place down in the cellar, this great spontaneous voice, placed before the microphone by the minions of Mayor Ed Kelly, became famous overnight as a horde of reporters swarmed out to trace down the source of the great noise.

In his modest way, Mr. Garry described himself as "just an ordinary lug who loves the game of politics." He authorized his hearers to "put it down that my heart and soul is in my work, and that I think Ed Kelly and Pat Nash are two of the greatest politicical figures in American history."

Mr. Garry is a picturesque fellow. When he learned that he was to be responsible for the task of organizing the Kelly clique at the stadium, he said that "it was a job right up my alley." Swarming to the convention, thousands of the Kelly-Nash machine got by the doorkeepers into the galleries. Mr. Garry was gleeful. Down in the electrician's room, where the public-address system was installed, Mr. Garry sat at the side of Ed Calihan, head electrician. Together they planned a spontaneous demonstration. As the speech of the Democratic permanent chairman drew to a close, the President's name burst out. This was Mr. Garry's cue. He threw a switch in the sound system, and roared into his private microphone, "We want Roosevelt." Over and over again he repeated it. Then he went into a few impromptu variations, "The party wants Roosevelt." He added New Jersey. He counted in Michigan. Then it was the world. And finally he said, Everybody wants the President.

Tom Garry was not satisfied yet. He deserted the booth to survey his handiwork. Up behind Mayor Kelly's box, he ran to watch the results. He waved his arms to one section of the gallery, and the noise lifted from the south side. He turned north and the north side of the stadium rocked with noise. Down stairs trotted Mr. Garry, to turn on a little more volume. Six times, the superintendent went up and down. From his booth, he instructed the organist to roar out a chorus of Happy Days Are Here Again. It was a masterful performance.

But the Nation knows that it was only a performance. It was as spontaneous as a meeting of the Reichstag. And it deceived about as many people as are deceived by a puppet show into believing that the thing is real.

The Nation will not soon forget Tom Garry's work. We shall remember it and register our complete refusal to become a party to such an exhibit.
